

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS, ANNOTATED.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George W. BENNETT

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.

(...Me....)

1. Seizure of property in the course of transportation by an officer without any warrant or other legal process does not exonerate the carrier for non-delivery.

2. Common carriers are not included in the provision of Rev. Stat., chap. 30, § 12, imposing a penalty on "whoever . . . has in possession" between October 1 and January 1, more than the number therein specified of the carcasses of certain wild animals.

3. A shipper's knowledge of directions to the carrier's agent not to receive certain articles for transportation will not relieve the carrier from liability for their loss if their transportation is actually undertaken.

4. The game laws of a State can give no authority to take carcasses of animals, or parts thereof, while in the course of interstate transportation, away from a common carrier on the ground that the animals have been killed in violation of such laws.

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to recover the value of the saddles of three deer alleged to have been lost while in defendant's possession for transportation. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. J. Whiting for plaintiff.

Messrs. Barker, Vose & Barker, for defendant.

NOTE.—Liability of the carrier for goods in transit.

If the goods are delivered at the usual place of receiving goods for shipment, and the fact of their delivery is brought home to the carrier or his duly authorized agents, there can be no question as to the responsibility accruing to the carrier as far as the end of his route, for he is bound to keep the goods safely after delivery to him for transportation, as well as to carry them safely. Dale v. Hall, 1 Wils. 281; Clarke v. Needles, 25 Pa. 388; Southern Exp. Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635.

But if the property is received upon the premises of the carrier, to wait further instructions before transportation, his liability is that of a houseman only, until the instructions are received. O'Neill v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 60 N. Y. 138; Baron v. Eldredge, 100 Mass. 455; Rogers v. Wheeler, 52 N. Y. 232. And see Gilbert v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 4 Hun, 373, 6 Thomp. & C. 662.

If the deposit of the goods on the premises of the carrier is a mere accessory to the carriage, that is, if they are deposited solely for the purpose of being forwarded to their destination without further orders, the responsibility of the carrier begins from the time they were so received; but when the property is deposited subject to the further orders of the consignor, the rule is otherwise, as just stated. Wade v. Wheeler, 3 Lans. 201, affirmed, 47 N. Y. 668; Ladue v. Griffith, 25 N. Y. 364; Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244; Maving v. Todd, 1 Stark. 72; Michigan, S. & N. J. R. Co. v. Shurtz, 7 Mich. 515; Blossom v. Griffin, 13 N. Y. 509; Hickox v. Naugatuck R. Co. 31 Conn. 281; Watts v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 106 Mass. 466. See Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McClellan, 54 Ill. 58.

Inquiry as to value.

It is the duty of the carrier to make inquiry as to the value of the goods delivered to him, and the consignor must answer at his peril; and if such inquiry is not made, and the goods are received at such valuation for transportation as is asked with reference to its bulk, weight or external appearance, the carrier is liable for the loss, irrespective of its value. Gorham Mfg. Co. v. Fargo, 45 How. Pr. 90, 3 Jones & S. 434.

Fraud, imposition or unfair concealment as to the contents or value of the goods will relieve the carrier of responsibility. Phillips v. Earle, 8 Pick. 182; Orange County Bank v. Brown, 9 Wend. 118; Warner v. Western Transp. Co. 5 Robt. 490; Reif v. Rapp, 3 Watts & S. 21.

Burden of proof.

If property has been delivered to the carrier or his duly authorized agents, and it has not been delivered by him to the consignee, this is prima facie evidence of negligence and liability. Whitesides v. Russell, 8 Watts & S. 44; Van Winkle v. South Carolina R. Co. 38 Ga. 32; Davidson v. Graham, 2 Ohio St. 141; Peck v. Weeks, 34 Conn. 152; Stokes v. Saltonstall, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. ed. 115; Hastings v. Pepper, 11 Pick. 41.

It is frequently difficult to show the loss or damage done in order to fix the liability of the carrier (see Ringgold v. Haven, 1 Cal. 108; Midland R. Co. v. Bromley, 17 C. B. 378; Woodbury v. Frink, 14 Ill. 279), and the burden of proof is cast upon him to show that the loss resulted from such causes as will exempt him from responsibility. Chapman v. New Orleans, J. & G. N. Co. 21 La. Ann. 224; Levering v. Union Transp. & Ins. Co. 42 Mo. 88; Turney v. Wilson, 7 Yerg. 340; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Morehead, 5 W. Va. 233; Ewart v. Street, 2 Bail. L. 161; King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, C. C. 358; Winne v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 31 Iowa, 583; Hall v. Cheney, 36 N. H. 27; Agnew v. Steamer Contra Costa, 27 Cal. 425; Tarbox v. Eastern Steam.

Animals feræ naturæ when legally killed by a person, are absolutely his own.

A delivery is always sufficient if the proper servant of the company accept the goods to carry, whether any bill or entry in the books of the company is made or not.

The American Express Company did not restrict its liability, as no notice was brought home to the plaintiff, or was assented to by him.

The saddles were not in the possession of the American Express Company within the meaning of section 12, chap. 80, Rev. Stat.

Also such could not be the fact because it would be in violation of the Interstate Commerce Law.

Common carriers cannot select what they may carry or what they may refuse, but are bound to take all which offer.

When the box of deer saddles was taken by the defendant Company for transportation out of the State, and transportation began, they became subjects of commerce, and were governed by the laws of the United States.

Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715; The "Daniel Ball", 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 557-565, 19 L. ed. 999-1002; Pacific Coast S. Co. v. Board of Railroad Comrs. 18 Fed. Rep. 10; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347.

Foster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is undisputed that the plaintiff was lawfully possessed and the owner of the saddles of three deer, which were legally killed under the laws of this State; that the same were closely boxed in good condition for shipment, and delivered by the plaintiff onto the platform of the Maine Central Railroad Company at Newport Station, plainly marked to the consignees in Boston. The defendant's agent was notified that the box was left for transportation, and thereupon he delivered it into the defendant's car, on the boat Co. 50 Me. 339; Cameron v. Rich, 4 Strobb. L. 163; Bazin v. Steamship Co. 3 Wall. Jr. 229.

If it is satisfactorily shown that the loss arose from one of the excepted causes, such as flood or fire, the carrier is relieved of liability without proving affirmatively that he was guilty of no negligence. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Reeves, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 176, 19 L. ed. 909.

The proof of such negligence, if the negligence is alleged to exist, rests on the party asserting it. Farnham v. Camden & A. R. Co. 55 Pa. 59; Western Transp. Co. v. Downer, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 129, 20 L. ed. 160; Colton v. Cleveland & P. R. Co. 67 Pa. 211, 5 Am. Rep. 424; Patterson v. Clyde, 67 Pa. 500; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 8 Kan. 623; Childs v. Little Miami R. Co. 1 Cin. S. C. (Ohio) 480; Clark v. Barnwell, 53 U. S. 12 How. 272, 13 L. ed. 985; Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & T. Co. 46 N. Y. 271, reversing 2 Daly. 454. See Westcott v. Fargo, 63 Barb. 349, 6 Lans. 319, affirmed, 61 N. Y. 542; Lewis v. Smith, 107 Mass. 334.

The principle established.

It is conclusively established as a principle of law in this country that a carrier, in the absence of a special contract, express or implied, for the safe carriage of goods to their destination, is only bound to carry safely to the end of his line, and there duly deliver to the next carrier in his route. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Myrick, 107 U. S. 102, 27 L. ed. 325; Knight v. Providence & W. R. Co. 13 R. I. 572; Piedmont Mfg. Co. v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 19 S. C. 358; Detroit & B. C. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 43 Mich. 609; St. Louis Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, V. T. H. & I. R. Co. 104 U. S. 146, 26 L. ed. 679; Harris v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 15 R. I. 371; Clyde v. Hubbard, 88 Pa. 353; 13 L. R. A.

Goldsmith v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 12 Mo. App. 479; Crawford v. Southern R. Asso. 51 Miss. 232.

The question of the first carrier's liability beyond his own line depends upon the inquiry whether he in any form assumed or held himself out to the public as assuming any responsibility beyond the terminus of his own route. St. Louis Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, V. T. H. & I. R. Co. 104 U. S. 146, 26 L. ed. 679.

They are only answerable for the ordinary and proximate consequences of neglect, and not for those that are remote and extraordinary. Morrison v. Davis, 30 Pa. 171.

This is also decided by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. Owing to defective machinery, goods did not arrive for six days after they were due, and then were destroyed by a flood. The court said: "The negligence of the carrier was remote; it had ceased to operate as an active, efficient and prevailing cause as soon as the wool had been carried beyond Syracuse, and therefore cannot subject the carrier to a responsibility for an injury to the property resulting from a subsequent inevitable accident, which was the proximate cause by which it was produced." Denny v. New York Cent. R. Co. 13 Gray, 487.

In a case decided by the supreme court of New York, where the liability of the carrier was maintained and the damage was occasioned by a flood, the decision was placed expressly upon the gross neglect of the company. Michaels v. New York Cent. R. Co. 30 N. Y. 575.

Though the proximate cause may be occasioned by inevitable accident, the carrier is still bound to use care and diligence. Yet no greater foresight arrival of the train, but no receipt or bill of lading was ever given to the plaintiff. Upon the arrival of the train at Augusta, the saddles were seized by a game-warden, and by him removed from the defendant's car, without any search-warrant or other legal process, and without objections from the defendant Company or its agents, and have never since been delivered either to the consignees or the Express Company.

Upon the facts thus stated, the defendant's liability is fully established. The plaintiff's ownership of the property, its delivery to the defendant for transportation, and its acceptance for that purpose, and its non-delivery to the consignees, are prima facie evidence of negligence. The burden is therefore upon the defendant to show facts exempting it from liability. Little v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 Me. 241.

The property of the plaintiff, while in the hands of the defendant as common carrier, in transitu, was seized by an officer without any warrant or other legal process. Nor does it appear that any was ever obtained. The officer was therefore a mere trespasser, and the defendant was liable, under the rule of the common law, in the same manner as if it had allowed any other trespasser to take the property out of its custody. Edwards v. White Line Transit Co. 104 Mass. 163. As against the plaintiff, the seizure was of no more validity than a trespass by an unofficial person. There has never been any adjudication from any tribunal that the property seized was contraband, or other than the lawful property of the plaintiff. The common carrier is not relieved from the fulfillment of his contract, or his liability as such carrier, any more than if the loss had occurred from fire, theft, robbery or accident. He stands in the relation of insurer, where, as in this case, no special contract is shown, and upon grounds of public policy is liable for all losses resulting from accident, trespass, theft or any kind of unlawful disposition of the property intrusted to him to carry, excepting only such as arise by the act of God or public enemies. Adams v. Scott, 104 Mass. 166; Kiff v. Old Colony & N. W. R. Co. 117 Mass. 593; Fillebroich v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 55 Me. 462.

In the case of Edwards v. White Line Transit Co., supra, it was held that, while the carrier was not liable in trover for conversion of the property, he was nevertheless liable on his contract or obligations as common carrier, where the officer seizing the property was a trespasser. "The owner may, it is true," says the court, "maintain trover against the officer who took the property from the carrier; but he is not obliged to resort to him for his remedy. He may proceed directly against the carrier upon his contract, and leave the carrier to pursue the property in the hands of those who have wrongfully taken it from him."

But the defendant claims exemption from liability in this action on the ground that the property was put into its possession fraudulently; that having had in its possession, and transported during the year, after the first day of October, and before the time when this property was delivered to it, three deer from Newport Station, to places beyond the limits of the State, it directed its agents not to receive for transportation any deer or parts thereof, and that this fact was known of extraordinary perils is expected of him than of other men, and no greater penalty visited for his failure. When he discovers himself in peril the law requires of him ordinary care, skill and foresight. This is defined to be the common prudence which men of prudence and heads of families usually exhibit in matters that are interesting to them. It means, as difficulties increase in great danger, great care is the ordinary care of a prudent man. Morrison v. Davis, 20 Pa. 171.

If one uses the precautions which a reasonable man would use under the circumstances, he is not responsible for omitting other precautions which are conceivable, even though if he had used them the injury would certainly have been avoided. Shearn & Redf. Neg. 7.

A common carrier is bound safely to carry the goods to their destination, unless prevented by some cause arising from irresistible force, over which he has no control and which cannot be guarded against by the watchful exertion of human skill and prudence. The Niagara v. Cordes, 62 U. S. 21 How. 24, 16 L. ed. 46; Gordon v. Buchanan, 5 Yerg. 71; Oakley v. Port of Portsmouth & R. U. S. Packet Co. 34 Eng. L. & Eq. 530.

No matter what degree of prudence may be exercised by the carrier and his servants, although the delusion by which it is baffled, or the force by which it is overcome is inevitable, yet, if it be the result of human means, the carrier is responsible. McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. 193; Proprietors of Trent Nav. Co. v. Wood, 3 Esp. 127; Campbell v. Morse, 1 Harp. 466; Charleston & C. S. B. Co. v. Bacon, Id. 222; The Niagara v. Cordes, 62 U. S. 21 How. 23, 16 L. ed. 46. See Read v. Spaulding, 30 N. Y. 630.

Denny v. New York Cent. R. Co., 13 Gray, 451, is not against these cases, because the court there held that when the damages by flood occurred, the defendants no longer held the goods as common carriers.

It is for the carrier to show any modification of the responsibility. See also Chamberlain v. Western Transp. Co. 45 Barb. 218; The Niagara v. Cordes, 62 U. S. 21 How. 23, 16 L. ed. 47; Elliott v. Rosell, 10 Johns. 7; Richards v. London & S. C. R. Co. 7 C. B. 839.

The moment a faulty negligence begins, the carrier becomes an insurer against the consequences therefrom, both ordinary and extraordinary. Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716; Bell v. Reed, 4 Binn. 127; Hart v. Allen, 2 Watts, 114; Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. 492; Crosby v. Fitch, 12 Conn. 410.

Of seizure by judicial process.

In a case decided in England at not prius, by Lord Ellenborough, in 1806 (Gosling v. Higgins, 1 Campb. 451), a vessel had been detained and condemned in Jamaica for a breach of Revenue Laws; but on appeal the condemnation was reversed. It was held that the master was liable for a loss caused by the delay, the court saying: "You have an action against the officers. The shipper can only look to the owner or master of a ship." This last proposition is clearly wrong. We do not find the case cited in any late English work on Carriers, and it is no doubt regarded as bad law. But in a late case in Massachusetts it was held that, in a suit against a common carrier for non-delivery of goods, it is no defense to say that they were taken from the carrier by an officer under an attachment against anyone who was not their owner. Edwards v. White by report to the plaintiff before he delivered the box to the defendant's agent.

Notwithstanding these facts may all be true, they constitute no defense to this action. The Statute invoked by the defendant (Rev. Stat. chap. 80, § 12) is as follows: "Whoever kills, destroys, or has in possession between the first days of October and January more than one moose, two caribou, or three deer, forfeits one hundred dollars for every moose, and forty dollars for every caribou or deer, killed, destroyed, or in possession in excess of said number; and all such moose, caribou or deer, or the carcasses or parts thereof, are forfeited to the prosecutor. Whoever has in possession, except alive, more than the aforesaid number of moose, deer or caribou, or parts thereof, shall be deemed to have killed or destroyed them in violation of law."

The defendant claims that under this Statute it could not lawfully take any more deer, or parts thereof, into its possession for transportation before the following January.

But we cannot adopt such a construction of this Statute as would make it apply to common carriers. Such construction as claimed by the defendant would make it unlawful for the carrier to transport, between the first days of October and January, the carcasses of moose, caribou or deer lawfully killed before the first day of October. Laying aside all constitutional questions, for the present, in relation to the doctrine of interstate commerce, it is sufficient to say that it was not the intention of the Legislature so to apply it. The Statute, like many others, may in general terms be broad enough to embrace corporations as well as natural persons within its prohibition. But its construction must be such as was evidently intended by the Legislature. That intention, to some extent, may be ascertained by taking into consideration the evil sought to be remedied. Such was the decision of this court in its construction of the section following the one now under consideration. Allen v. Young, 76 Me. 80. In that case it was held that the transportation of the hide or the carcass of a deer from place to place in this State is not unlawful if the deer was killed at a time when it was lawful to do so, notwithstanding the Statute in express terms provides that whoever carries or transports from place to place the carcass or hide of any such animal, or any part thereof, during the period in which the killing of such animal is prohibited, shall forfeit the sum of $40. Certainly that language is as broad, comprehensive, and imperative as that of the Statute invoked in this case. Yet the court aptly remarked that it could see no possible motive for making such transportation a crime. To the same effect was the decision in State v. Beal, 75 Me. 289. "The meaning of the Legislature may be extended beyond the precise words used in the law, from the reason or motive upon which the Legislature proceeded, from the end in view, or the purpose which was designed." United States v. Freeman, 44 U. S. 8 How. 557, 565, 11 L. ed. 724, 728; Holmes v. Paris, 75 Me. 559, and authorities there cited.

The box was delivered to and received by the Company. No information was asked concerning its contents, and none given. If the plaintiff knew by report, when he delivered the property to the defendant, that its agents had been directed not to receive any deer or parts thereof, yet there was no limitation of the Company's responsibility by

Seizure by judicial process, of property in transportation, not brought about by any laches or connivance of the carrier, and of which prompt notice is given, is one of the implied exceptions in the carrier's contract as to liability for non-delivery. The M. M. Chase, 37 Fed. Rep. 708.

It is settled that the bailee may defend against the claim of the bailor, by showing that the goods have been taken from him by legal process. And in a note he adds: "If this defense were not valid, it might compel the party to resist the acts of a public officer in the discharge of his duty, which the law will never do." 2 Redf. Railroads, 158.

In New York, where the property was forcibly seized by a constable, on a complaint that the property had been stolen, the court said: "But my associates not passing upon the question whether the property was delivered to the true owners, desire to put this case upon the doctrine that the common carrier is exonerated from his obligation to his bailor, where the property of the latter is taken from him by due legal process, provided the bailor is promptly notified of such taking. . . . The judgment of the supreme court should therefore be affirmed. All affirm on the ground that when the property is taken from the carrier by legal process, and he gives notice thereof, he is discharged." Bliven v. Hudson River R. Co. 36 N. Y. 403.

In this same case, the supreme court, it was held that "the bailee must assure himself, and show the court that the proceedings are regular and valid, but he is not bound to litigate for his bailor, or to show that the judgment or decision of the tribunal issuing the process, or seizing the goods, was correct in law or in fact. This is the rule as to bailees in general, and it includes the case of common carriers." Bliven v. Hudson River R. Co. 36 Barb. 191.

In a case where goods were seized on attachment, the court held: "If goods are taken from a bailee or carrier by authority of law, in any case coming within these exceptions, there is no doubt that it is a good defense to an action by the bailor or shipper, for a non-delivery." Van Winkle v. United States Mail S. S. Co. 37 Barb. 122.

In Vermont, where goods in the hands of a wharfinger were seized under legal process, the court held that if they were taken from the wharfinger or warehouseman, by lawful process, the wharfinger or warehouseman can protect himself in a suit brought against him by the owner. Burton v. Wilkinson, 18 Vt. 186.

In order, however, that such seizure may be a legal excuse for the non-delivery of the goods, it must be shown that the proceedings or process under which it was made by the officer was legal and valid, and that it empowered him to make it; for if it was void because issuing from a court having no jurisdiction, or for any other reason, and conferred no such authority, he would be a mere trespasser, and the carrier would be no more obliged to submit to his acts under it than to those of any other wrong-doer. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. v. Wilcox, 48 Ga. 432; Bliven v. Hudson River R. Co. 36 N. Y. 403; Edwards v. White Line Transit Co. 104 Mass. 159. See Hutchinson, Carr. § 400.

special contract, or such knowledge brought home to this plaintiff and assented to by him, as would be necessary to limit such responsibility. Fillebrown v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 55 Me. 462. "A carrier may limit his responsibility for property intrusted to him," says Bigelow, Ch. J., in Buckland v. Adams Exp. Co. 97 Mass. 125, "by a notice containing reasonable and suitable restrictions, if brought home to the owner of goods delivered for transportation, and assented to clearly and unequivocally by him. It is also settled that assent is not necessarily to be inferred from the mere fact that knowledge of such notice on the part of the owner or consignee of goods is shown. The evidence must go further, and be sufficient to show that the terms on which the carrier proposed to carry the goods were adopted as the contract between the parties, according to which the service of the carrier was to be rendered."

It is undoubtedly the right of the carrier to require good faith on the part of those who deliver goods to be carried, or enter into contracts with him. The degree of care to be exercised, as well as the amount of compensation for the carriage of property, depends largely on its nature and value; and no fraud or deception should be used which would mislead the carrier as to the extent of his duties or the risks which he assumes. But we fail to see any such evidence of fraud or deception in this case as would exonerate these defendants.

This property was lawfully the property of the plaintiff. It was delivered to and accepted by the defendant Company for transportation to a point beyond the limits of this State. Their liability as common carriers held them to a strict fulfillment of their obligation in relation to the property in their charge. That obligation was not merely to transport the property in this State, but to a point outside of its limits in another State. It had lawfully commenced to move as an article of commerce from one State to another. From that moment it became the subject of interstate commerce, and, as such, was subject only to national regulation, and not to the police power of the State. The same is unquestionably true in relation to whatever agency or instrumentality may be used as the means of transporting such commodities as may lawfully become the subject of purchase, sale or exchange, under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. The transportation of the subject of interstate commerce, where it is such as may lawfully be purchased, sold, or exchanged, is without doubt a constituent of commerce itself, and is protected by and subject only to the regulation of Congress. The "Daniel Ball", 77 U. A "relative" is one connected with the testator by blood and not by marriage only within the meaning of Rev. Stat., chap. 74, § 10 giving lineal descendants the share of a relative of the testator, who is a devisee if he dies before the testator.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County for the opinion of the Law Court of a suit brought by the executor of the last will of Sarah H. Jenks, deceased, to obtain a construction of such will and instructions as to the disposition of funds in his hands. The will gave, inter alia, a legacy of $1,000 to Marcia G. Lord, and the residue of the estate to "John Patten, of Bath, his heirs and assigns, to his and their own use forever." The will was dated November 28, 1885, and testatrix died July 20, 1887.

Marcia G. Lord was a sister of Caleb S. Jenks, husband of the testatrix. She died before testatrix, leaving as her only heir a daughter, Annie Louise Lord, one of the defendants to this suit.

John Patten, the residuary legatee, after the death of his first wife, married a sister of testatrix, who also died March 30, 1862, leaving no issue. Patten died February 24, 1887, leaving as his only heirs John O. Patten and Clara Patten Goodwin, children of a son by his first wife.

Neither Patten nor his grandchildren were blood relatives of testatrix. The grandchildren were made parties defendant.

The answer stated that testatrix was for over fifty years a member of John Patten's family

NOTE.—The term "relation" defined.

It has long been settled that, in the construction of wills, the word "relation" or "relatives" includes those who are entitled as next of kin under the Statute of Distributions. Bouvier, Law Dict. 15th ed. title Relations, and the case there cited.

"A gift to one's relations does not, prima facie, refer to husband, wife, or marriage connections, but to those only of one's blood." Schouler, Wills, § 537, and cases.

A grandson's widow is not entitled under a devise to grandchildren, nor does a gift to children extend to children by affinity. 2 Jarman, Wills, 5th ed. 121, 151, and Bigelow's notes.

These rules may be varied by the context of a will showing different intention. It has been held in the State of Maine that a husband could be regarded as an heir to his wife, but that doctrine was overruled in Lord v. Bourne, 63 Me. 368.

The more common use of the term expresses kindred of blood or affinity, though properly only the former is embraced. Hence, in strict technical sense, it does not include husband and wife, but may include any and every relation that exists in social life, if literally taken; but it has long been settled that a bequest to "relations" applies to those who, by virtue of the Statute of Distributions, would take the property as next of kin. Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 38; Handley v. Wrightson, 60 Md. 206; Anderson's Law Dict. title Relation.

and never made any compensation for the services so obtained; that testatrix always insisted on the mutual use between herself and the members of John Patten's family of the appropriate address of blood relationship; that the property left by testatrix was received by her by gift from John Patten or his son, Gilbert E. R. Patten, father of John O. and Clara Patten, and that testatrix fully intended that said John O. and Clara should succeed their grandfather John in the title to her residuary estate.

Messrs. Baker, Baker & Cornish for defendants John O. Patten and Clara Patten Goodwin.

Messrs. Nathan Cleaves, Henry B. Cleaves and Stephen C. Perry, for the defendants, next of kin and heirs-at-law:

It is the general rule of law that a devise or legacy to one who dies before the testator becomes void.

Ballard v. Ballard, 18 Pick. 48; American Law of Administration, p. 934, § 435, and cases cited.

The only exception to this general rule of law is created by statute.

Rev. Stat. chap. 74, § 10.

The word "relative" in that Statute applies to persons in the line of consanguinity, and not to those connected by marriage.

2 Wins. Exrs. 1004; 2 Jarman, Wills, 666; American Law of Administration, 936; Ennis v. Pentz, 3 Bradf. 385. See also Maitland v. Adair, 5 Ves. Jr. 231; Worsley v. Johnson, 3 Atk. 761; Moses v. Allen, 81 Me. 268; Estate of Pfuelb, 48 Cal. 643; Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 38; Prather v. Prather, 58 Ind. 141; Cleaver v. Cleaver, 39 Wis. 96; Keniston v. Adams, 6 New Eng. Rep. 547, 80 Me. 294.

The insertion in the bequest to John Patten of the words "his heirs and assigns, to his and their use forever," does not enlarge the rights of the descendants of John Patten. These words do not indicate that it was the intention of testatrix that they should take by substitution, and in case of the legatee's death before the testatrix, those taking by representation are not entitled to what the person they represent never had.

342; Marcell v. Featherston, 83 Ind. 339; American Law of Administration, § 434, p. 936, and cases there cited.

Walton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, instituted by the executor of the last will and testament of Sarah H. Jenks, asking the court to determine the construction of the will, and whether certain legacies therein mentioned lapse, or go to the lineal descendants of the legatees, the legatees themselves having died before the testatrix. Generally, if a legatee dies before the testator, the legacy lapses. But to this rule there is an exception in favor of relatives. "When a relative of the testator, having a devise of real or personal estate, dies before the testator, leaving lineal descendants, they take such estate as would have been taken by such deceased relative if he survived." Rev. Stat. chap. 74, § 10.

The word "relative," in this section of the Statute, has already been defined by the court. It means one connected with the testator by blood,—a blood relation. It does not include within its meaning one connected with the testator by marriage only. So held in Keniston v. Adams, 80 Me. 290, 6 New Eng. Rep. 547. And such is generally held to be its meaning, when used in similar statutes, although it may sometimes be used in a more extended sense. Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 38.

Such being the law, the conclusion is inevitable that the bequests to John Patten and Marcia G. Lord, mentioned in the will of Sarah H. Jenks, are void. They both died before the testatrix. And, being connections of hers by marriage only, they were not relatives within the meaning of the law, and their legacies lapsed; and the residuum of the estate, after paying all other legacies and the expenses of administration, must be paid to the heirs-at-law of the testatrix. Costs, including reasonable counsel fees, are allowed to all the parties to this suit, to be paid by the executor out of the assets of the estate, and charged in his administration account.

Decree accordingly.

Messrs. Blair & Stribling for appellee.

Cooper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On or about the 3d of September, 1889, the plaintiff with her husband purchased from the agent of appellant at Myrtle two tickets for transportation over appellant's road to Blue Springs and return, Myrtle and Blue Springs being stations on appellant's road. These tickets were handed to the conductor on the train running from Myrtle to Blue Springs, and by accident and mistake he returned to the passenger the wrong part of the tickets, giving to them that portion which called for transportation from Myrtle to Blue Springs, which he should have kept, and retaining that portion calling for passage from Blue Springs to Myrtle, which he should have returned to the passenger. The plaintiff went from Blue Springs to Sherman, another station on appellant's road, and on the 6th of September, being desirous of returning to Myrtle, she purchased a ticket from Sherman to Blue Springs, and for the journey from that place to Myrtle tendered that portion of the round-trip ticket from Myrtle to Blue Springs that had been returned to her by the conductor on the 3d, but this ticket the conductor refused to accept, because it entitled the bearer to transportation from Myrtle to Blue Springs, but not from Blue Springs to Myrtle. The plaintiff had not before noticed the mistake that had been made by the other conductor, but then explained to the conductor of the train upon which she was traveling how it had occurred, and insisted upon her right to be carried on the ticket. But this he declined, and informed the plaintiff that she must either pay train fare, buy a ticket at Blue Springs when the train should reach that point, or leave the train at that point. The plaintiff and conductor testified to about the same facts as to what transpired until the train reached Blue Springs, at which point the conductor stated that plaintiff and her husband left the train upon his refusal to carry them on the tickets they then had, while the plaintiff testified that the conductor spoke to her in an angry manner, and took her by the arm to put her off the train. At all events, the plaintiff left the train at Blue Springs with her husband, and there remained until the following day, and brings this suit for damages against the appellant. The jury awarded her damages in the sum of $300, and from a judgment for that sum the defendant appeals.

The decisions are in direct and palpable conflict upon the liability of a common carrier for failure to transport a passenger under the circumstances named. In New York, Michigan, Illinois, Maryland, Ohio, Wisconsin, Connecticut, New Jersey, Massachusetts and North Carolina, it seems to have been decided that the ticket presented by the passenger is the only evidence of his right to travel upon the train which can be recognized by the conductor; and that if, by reason of the negligence of other servants of the carrier, a wrong ticket has been given to the passenger, or the right ticket has been given to him, but erroneously taken from him, the passenger's right of action is for the wrong thus committed; and that he may not insist upon his right to travel on the wrong ticket, or without it, where it has been taken up, and recover damages for the refusal of the carrier to permit him to do so; and that the carrier may lawfully eject him from its train, using no more force than is necessary for that purpose. The authorities in support of this rule are found in the brief of counsel for appellant. On the other hand, it is held in Georgia and Indiana that the passenger is entitled to travel according to his real contract with the carrier, where the mistake in giving the proper ticket, or in taking up a proper one held by the passenger, is caused by the negligence of the servants of the carrier.

In a more recent case in Michigan than those cited by appellant's counsel, — Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 64 Mich. 631, — the plaintiff had applied and paid for a ticket from Manton to Traverse City. The agent gave him a ticket previously issued for a ride from Sturgis to Traverse City. There was evidence tending to show that the ticket had been canceled by conductor's marks for a ride between Sturgis and Walton, and the trial court instructed the jury that "if they believed the ticket was punched, indicating to the conductor by the punch-mark that it had been used before between Grand Rapids and Walton, that would be evidence of an infirmity in the ticket, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to insist upon that ticket being received." This instruction was held to be erroneous, the court saying: "When the plaintiff told the conductor on the train that he had paid his fare, and stated the amount he had paid to the agent who gave him the ticket he presented, and told him it was good, it was the duty of the conductor to accept the statement of the plaintiff until he found out it was not true, no matter what the ticket contained in words, figures or other marks." The most remarkable thing about this decision is that it was made in the same case, upon the same facts, and between the same parties as that reported in 53 Mich. 118, in which in an opinion delivered by Judge Cooley, it was held that, as between the conductor and the passenger, "the ticket must be conclusive evidence of the extent of the passenger's right to travel." There is a class of cases somewhat analogous to the present one, in which, by a uniform course of decisions, so far as we are informed, it is held that the conductor must accept the statements of the passenger. We refer to those cases in which different rates are charged for one who has procured a ticket and one who pays upon the train. It is held that as a condition precedent to the exercise of this right to charge higher train rates, and to expel one refusing to pay them, a reasonable opportunity should be given by the carrier to the passenger to procure the ticket required, and that one to whom no such opportunity has been afforded, and who for refusing to pay the higher rate is expelled from the train, may recover damages therefor. Hutchinson, Carr, § 571, and authorities in note 2; Forsee v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 63 Miss. 66.

Without determining more upon this disputed question than is necessary for the decision of the case before us, it is sufficient to say that where, as here, the ticket in the hands of the passenger supports and confirms the truth of his statement, and no possible injury can result to the carrier by the conductor's accepting and acting thereon, he must so act, or refuse at the peril of inviting an action for damages against his principal if the statement be true. We do not decide that a person holding a ticket from Myrtle to Blue Springs has a right to ride from Blue Springs to Myrtle; but no real injury could result to the carrier in recognizing such right, for the distance is the same, and in the usual course of business as many trains pass in one direction as the other. What we do decide is that a passenger holding and attempting to use such ticket, under the circumstances disclosed in this record, and explaining to the conductor how the mistake occurred by which the ticket, read in the wrong direction, makes such a reasonable and probable showing as entitles him to be dealt with as a passenger, and therefore that any regulation of the carrier authorizing the conductor of its trains to disregard such statement is unreasonable, and need not be submitted to by the passenger.

We find no error in the record for which the judgment should be reversed, and it is affirmed.

convened, the parties, contestor and contestee appeared in person and by counsel and such steps were taken from time to time as carried the cause to the 22d day of December, 1890, which time was set for the commencement of the trial proper. On the 22d day of December, 1890, the parties appeared and the contestor moved for a postponement of the cause to Friday, December 26, 1890, which motion was sustained.

The record entry of this motion and of the order postponing the cause, is as follows: "Comes now the contestor by his attorney and in person, and asks that the hearing of the cause at issue be postponed until Friday, December 26, 1890, to which the contestee interposes no objections, and which was accordingly done."

On the 26th day of December, 1890, the board again convened, the parties appeared, and the contestee moved the court to discontinue the cause, for the reason that more than twenty days had elapsed since the board of commissioners were called to try and determine the same. The board sustained the motion. The contestor thereupon appealed to the circuit court. In the circuit court the motion to discontinue was renewed and sustained by the court. The court thereupon rendered judgment confirming the contestee in his office, and against the contestor for costs.

The contestor in his appeal to this court assails the action of the court below upon two grounds: (1) that the court erred in sustaining the motion to discontinue; (2) that the court erred in rendering judgment against the appellant for costs.

Whether the motion to discontinue the cause was rightly sustained or not depends upon the construction to be given to sections 4760 and 4761, Rev. Stat. 1881. The two sections in question are as follows:

"4760. When such statement is filed with the auditor, he shall issue a notice to the board of county commissioners to meet at the courthouse at a designated time, not less than ten, nor more than twenty, days thereafter, to try such contested election, and shall issue a notice to the contestee to appear at the time and place specified in the notice to the commissioners; which, with a copy of such statement, shall be delivered to the sheriff of the county, who shall, within five days thereafter, serve the same on the contestee, by delivering to him a copy of such notice and statement, or leaving a copy thereof at his last usual place of residence.

"4761. The auditor, at the request of either party, shall issue subpoenas, which shall be served by the sheriff. Such board of commissioners shall try and determine such contest, and shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to swear and examine the same, to punish contempts as other courts, to adjourn or continue the trial from time to time, not exceeding twenty days altogether; to make the necessary orders for the payment of costs, and to coerce the payment of the same, and shall be governed in such trial by the rules of law obtaining in circuit courts. And if it be proven that any other person than the contestee has the highest number of legal votes, such board shall declare such person elected, and certify the same to the proper officer."

The controversy between the parties is over the twenty days' limitation contained in section 4761. Appellant's position is that it is not an absolute limitation, but is merely directory, and applies solely to the trial proper, after the cause has been submitted and the parties have commenced the introduction of testimony; while the appellee contends that it is mandatory, is an absolute limitation and embraces the entire proceeding, beginning with the day when the board is convened and organized to enter upon the investigation, and that when twenty days have elapsed the board has no longer jurisdiction to proceed. But little authority has been cited bearing upon this question, and we are inclined to think the authorities are somewhat meager. Indeed, we not only know of no case wherein the precise question has been decided, but no authority has come to our attention wherein the questions decided have sufficient analogy to make them of much value as authority, except as they serve to indicate the rule by which to construe the statute. The policy of the law seems to be to compel prompt action in hearing and disposing of contested elections.

The learned author of McCrary on Elections places much emphasis on this. He says: "A statutory provision, requiring notice of contest to be given within a given time from the date of the official count, or from the declaration of the result, or the issuing of the certificate of election or the like is peremptory; and the time cannot be enlarged. . . . And it may be added that there is the strongest reason for enforcing this rule most rigidly in cases of contested elections, because promptness in commencing and prosecuting the proceeding is of the utmost importance; to the end that a decision may be reached before the term has wholly or in great part expired." § 392.

Again: "The courts should require the parties to speed the cause, so that the official term which is in dispute may not expire, either in whole or in large part, before the final decision is reached." § 390.

Again: "There is, however, a very strong reason for requiring any such amendment to be made instant, and for bringing an election case to a prompt and speedy trial and determination, and it is this: The subject matter of the controversy is daily growing less and of less importance and value. The office is usually for a short term of one or perhaps several years only, and if the 'law's delays' are to be allowed in those as in other cases, the term would often expire before a decision could be reached." § 407.

Again: "As we have already seen, there are strong reasons for requiring the parties to an election contest to use great diligence in preparing for an early trial." § 408.

Of similar tenor is § 421.

The case of Bull v. Southwick, 2 N. M. 321, was an election contest. The Statute limited the time within which answers should be filed. Answers were filed within the time limited; but afterward, and after the expiration of the time limited, the contestee asked leave to file additional answers. The court said: "It is also my opinion that the very object of the Statute in regard to the pleading and practice in contested election cases is to afford, and at the same time compel, the observance of a speedy mode for conducting and terminating such cases. . . . These statutory provisions as to the time of filing and serving the notice of contest, answer and reply, are in effect Statutes of Limitation, taking from the judge all discretion as to extending the time. In my opinion this is one of the most salutary of our statutory laws. Experience has demonstrated that without some such compulsory mode as to the time of making up issues and their trial in contested election cases, subterfuges and delays might and would be successfully resorted to, so that a final determination could not be reached before the term of office would expire."

This case is followed and its interpretation of the statute is approved in Vigil v. Pradt (N. M.) 20 Pac. Rep. 795.

These authorities may aid us in determining the legislative intent, as it will be presumed the law-making power, in the enactment of a given statute, had in view settled rules of construction and intended that it should be construed in the light and line of the settled and uniform policy of the law, as relating to the subject matter of the Statute in question. Sutherland, Stat. Const. §§ 287-289, 333 et seq.

We conclude, therefore, that the Legislature intended by the limitation to compel a speedy determination of cases of this character.

It is a part of the common experience of those connected with courts, of which we must take notice, that the delays of litigation as a rule precede the trial proper of causes, and that after a cause is submitted and the hearing of testimony commenced it usually proceeds without interruption. It is before that time that the party desirous of delay employs his arts. If, therefore, the Legislature intended by this provision of the Statute to prevent delay, it is improbable that they would enact a time limitation applying only to that part of the procedure least liable to abuse by delay. If it was intended that the limitation should apply to only a portion of the procedure, we think it would probably have been applied to the steps preceding that time. In our opinion, it was the intention of the Legislature that the entire time given to the consideration of a contested election case by the board of county commissioners should be twenty days altogether. They are notified by the auditor to meet in special session for that purpose, and the limitation is intended to indicate the entire length of the special session which they may thus hold. The notice issued to them is that they meet at a designated time "to try such contested election."

Convened and organized in obedience to such notice, they constitute a special tribunal, having no authority except to try and decide that particular case; and, within the meaning of the Statute, the trial commences as soon as they are convened and organized and the parties appear before them. If the limitation applies only to the actual hearing of testimony, almost the last act in the drama, their session may be protracted indefinitely. This may be done, not necessarily by reason of any indifference or desire for delay on the part of the board; but the skill and ingenuity of counsel, by the use of dilatory practices, may find it possible to secure such delays as would indefinitely prolong the proceeding. If the limitation does not apply to the entire proceeding, there is no limit fixed by the Statute for the length of the session of such tribunal. This would be of itself so unusual and exceptional that, unless forced to it, we could not adopt such a construction of the Statute. The board of county commissioners, convened for any other purpose, have the limit of their sessions clearly fixed. Even the courts of record of the State, courts having general jurisdiction, all have fixed terms; and the circumstances under which they may continue in session beyond the time fixed are clearly specified.

Section 284, Elliott's Supplement, provides as follows: "That if, at the expiration of the time fixed by law for the continuance of the term of any court, the trial of any cause shall be progressing, said court may continue its sitting beyond such time and require the attendance of the jury and witnesses, and transact and enforce all other matters which shall be necessary for the determination of such cause; and in such case the term of said court shall not be deemed to have ended until the cause shall have been fully disposed of by the court."

While not deciding the question, because not necessary to a decision of this case, it is possible that if the trial of a contested election case was progressing at the expiration of the twenty days, this Statute might apply and operate to extend the term until it could be finally disposed of. Such a continuance, however, which may be called a continuance or extension of the term by necessity, would be a very different thing from that which was attempted in this case. Here a special tribunal, created and convened for a special purpose, with the period of its duration limited to twenty days, was convened and entered upon the discharge of its duties on the 4th day of December. On the 22d day of December, two days before its existence must terminate by operation of law, the party at whose instance it was convened, who invoked its creation that it might adjudicate upon his rights, asks that the cause may be continued two days beyond the legal limit of the existence of the tribunal. His request is granted and an order of that character is made, continuing the cause to the 26th day of December. When that time arrives, the court no longer exists. It had ceased to exist two days before, and the law had made no provision for its resuscitation. It was no longer in the power of the parties, even by agreement, to give it life and again clothe it with jurisdiction. When the board again assumed to meet on the 26th day of December, it had no legal existence as a court for the hearing of that cause; and no motion to discontinue the cause was necessary. There was nothing to discontinue, as the cause died with the court. What the effect of an order continuing the cause to a day beyond the term would be if made by the court, over the objection of the contestor, we need not consider, as no such question is before us. What we do decide, however, is that when the contestor himself, before the expiration of the term, without assigning any reason therefor, voluntarily asks and obtains a postponement which carries the cause two days beyond the time when the term would end by operation of law, he thereby discontinues his contest.

Appellant insists, however, that if the limitation of twenty days is to apply to the entire term, in the computation of the time Sundays are to be excluded. He cites no authority in support of this proposition, and we know of none. The rule for the computation of time in such cases is fixed by section 1280, Rev. Stat. 1881, and is that the time shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last, and if the last day be Sunday it shall be excluded. This of course includes intervening Sundays.

Appellant also argues that the court had no power to order a discontinuance of the cause, as there is no such thing as a discontinuance known to our practice. Discontinuance and dismissal are synonymous terms. Thurman v. James, 48 Mo. 235.

It is, however, not at all material what term was used. The case was at an end.

The judgment of the Circuit Court for costs was in accordance with § 4765, Rev. Stat. 1881, and was right.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Croft C. CARROLL, Resp't.,

(...N. Y....)

1. A check taken for an antecedent debt is conditional payment only in the absence of an agreement to the contrary.
2. The holder of a check is under obligation to an indorser thereon to present it for payment not later than the next day after its date.
3. Delay in presenting a check at the drawer's request, whereby its collection becomes impossible because of his insolvency, operates as payment up to the amount of the check in favor of an indorser who has transferred it to the holder on account of an antecedent debt.

4. Lack of money of the drawer in a bank to meet a check, where he would have provided for it or paid it if payment had been insisted upon, does not relieve the holder, who has taken it from an indorser on an antecedent debt, from his obligation to present it, or prevent his failure to do so until collection becomes impossible from operating as payment to the amount of the check.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court

NOTE.—Within what time check should be presented.

It is well settled that presentment of a check or draft on a bank the day after it is drawn is in season (Merchants Bank v. Spicer, 6 Wend. 443), and the same case holds checks and drafts to be subject to the same rule (Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 13 Wend. 133; and where the facts are not disputed, the use of due diligence is a question of law for the court. Bryden v. Bryden, 11 Johns. 187; Kelty v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 52 Barb. 323).

Where a draft sent to a bank for collection is presented by it and the drawee's check taken in payment thereof, and the draft surrendered, it is the duty of the bank to present such check for payment on the same day, if it can be so presented by the exercise of reasonable diligence; and if the check would have been paid if presented on that day, but is not good on the next, through the failure of the maker, the drawers of the draft are discharged, and the bank is liable to its depositors for its failure to collect it. Meadville First Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 16 Hun. 322; 1 Wait, Law and Pr. 773; and see Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 3 Am. Rep. 690, 62 N. Y. 545; Burkhalter v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 42 N. Y. 538, 40 How. Pr. 324.

In the absence of agreement or special controlling circumstances, it is the right of the drawer of a check to expect its presentment for payment at latest within banking hours on the day following the day of its delivery to the payee, provided the bank on which it is drawn be in the same place where the payee resides or does business; if the bank be not in such place, then the check must be put in due course for presentment, either by being duly mailed to the drawee or by being deposited for collection with a bank, according to the ordinary custom for such business in that place. Bodington v. Schlencker, 1 Nov. & M. 540, 4 Barn. & Ad. 752; O'Brien v. Smith, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 99, 17 13 L. R. A.

L. ed. 64; Taylor v. Sip, 30 N. J. L. 264; Ritchie v. Bradshaw, 5 Cal. 228; Wear v. Lee, 2 West. Rep. 450, 87 Mo. 352; Schoonfield v. Moon, 9 Helsk. 171; Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. v. Collins, 57 N. Y. 641; Kelty v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 52 Barb. 323; Himmelmänn v. Hotaling, 40 Cal. 111; Cawein v. Browninski, 6 Bush. 457; Strong v. Kink, 35 Ill. 9; Bickford v. First Nat. Bank of Chicago, 42 Ill. 238; Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171; Smith v. Jones, 20 Wend. 192; Moule v. Brown, 4 Bing. N. C. 236; Veazie Bank v. Winn, 40 Me. 62; Cromwell v. Lovett, 1 Hall. 56; Simpson v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Cal. 139.

But the holder does not obtain extra time for presentment by depositing the check in his bank for collection. If the payee of the check receive it on Monday and deposit it in his bank, presentment must still be made in the same place, or the check forwarded to any other place where the drawee's bank is, by the payee's bank, during banking hours on Tuesday. Alexander v. Burchfield. 1 Car. & M. 75, 7 Man. & G. 1061.

What is an ordinary mode of presentment.

When the defendant, instead of sending the note to an agent or correspondent at the drawee's bank for presentment, sent it by mail directly to the bank where it was payable, it will be considered an ordinary method of transacting such business, and the defendant is bound only to adopt the ordinary mode. This method is sanctioned in England, in the cases of Heywood v. Pickering, L. R. 9 Q. B. 423; Prideaux v. Criddle, L. R. 4 Q. B. 461; Bailey v. Bodenham, 16 C. B. N. S. 295; Hare v. Hently, 10 C. B. N. S. 65; and in this country in Shipsey v. Bowery Nat. Bank, 50 N. Y. 485. See Indig v. Brooklyn Nat. City Bank, 30 N. Y. 100.

A check or draft must be presented within a reasonable time. Werk v. Mad River Valley Bank, for the City of New York affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on account, in defense of which defendant pleaded the delivery of the indorsed check of a third person. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. E. Losey, with Mr. John W. Bartram, for appellant:

The plaintiff was guilty of laches in dealing with the Woodruff check. When he accepted the check he assumed the duty of causing proper demand of payment to be made, and notice of non-payment to be duly given to the defendant as indorser.

Even as against the maker of the check, it was the duty of the payee or holder to cause demand to be made at the bank on the day of its date or the following day.

Cromwell v. Lovett, 1 Hall, 56; Murray v. Judah, 6 Cow. 484; Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171; Burkhalter v. Second Nat. Bank, 42 N. Y. 588.

As against the defendant as indorser, the plaintiff owed a still stronger duty to cause immediate presentment to be made and notice of dishonor given, even though the maker of the check never had funds in the bank to meet it.

Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 13 Wend. 194, 10 Wend. 804; Little v. Phenix Bank, 2 Hill, 425; Murray v. Judah, supra; Darnall v. Morehouse, 45 N. Y. 64; Harbeck v. Craft, 4 Duer, 122; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1590; Morse, Banks &

Banking, p. 280; Alexander v. Burchfield, 7 Man. & G. 1061.

By reason of the plaintiff's neglect to make due demand and give due notice of the dishonor of the check in question, he discharged the defendant from all liability, either upon the check or upon the indebtedness for which it was transferred to the plaintiff.

See Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 52 N. Y. 545; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1587; Commercial Bank of Albany v. Hughes, 17 Wend. 98.

The mere insolvency of the drawee or acceptor of a draft is no excuse for neglecting to present it for payment.

Jackson v. Richards, 2 Cal. 343; Meadville First Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 24 Hun, 241; Clift v. Rodger, 25 Hun, 39; People v. Cromwell, 102 N. Y. 477, 484; Copper v. Powell, Anth. N. P. 68, 71, 74, and notes.

Mr. Charles E. Hughes for respondent.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indorsement and transfer by the defendant to the plaintiff of the check of Woodruff operated as provisional payment only of so much of the antecedent debt owing by the defendant to the plaintiff. There was no agreement that it should be taken in absolute satisfaction of the debt, and in the absence of such an agreement the intentment of law is that it was conditional payment only. Hill v. Beebe, 18 N. Y. 566; Bradford v. Fox, 38 N. Y. 289.

The debt remained until discharged by pay-

What is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Knott v. Venable, 42 Ala. 186; Walsh v. Dart, 23 Wis. 384; 1 Wait, Law & Pr. 773.

When a check is considered stale or overdue.

A check is considered stale or overdue, so as to allow of equitable defenses, whenever the delay in presentment has been so long that, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, it is sufficient to arouse the suspicions of a reasonably prudent man and put him upon inquiry. This may be taken as a reliable statement of the present law, notwithstanding it is claimed by one authority (Thompson, Bills, 118) that a check is "never overdue."

It is impossible to state the precise period of time at which a check is said to be "overdue." The conclusion in each case is determined by due consideration of the special circumstances surrounding the parties. Thus, in the light of some circumstances, a check is overdue when there was a delay in presentment of two and a half years (Skillman v. Titus, 32 N. J. L. 96); one year (Lancaster Bank v. Woodward, 18 Pa. 367); fourteen months (Cowing v. Altman, 71 N. Y. 436); five months (First Nat. Bank of Newton v. Needham, 29 Iowa, 249); five days. Down v. Halling, 4 Barn. & C. 330, 6 Dow. & R. 445, 2 Car. & P. 11.

On the contrary, it has been held that a check is not overdue, and may still be negotiated free from equitable defenses, where there has been a delay of one month (Leester v. Given, 8 Bush, 367); ten days (Ames v. Meriam, 98 Mass. 294); eight days (London & County Bkg. Co. v. Groome, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 238); six days (Rothschild v. Corney, 9 Barn. & C. 388); four days (First Nat. Bank of Rochester v. Harris, 108 Mass. 514); one day. Himmelmann v. Hotelling, 40 Cal. 111. See Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 446.

Reasonable time on checks.

The rule of what is a reasonable time in presenting checks for payment is regulated largely by the rules that obtain in cases of bills and notes. Thus, it has been held that presentment is timely if made on the second day after its date (Prideaux v. Criddle, L. R. 4 Q. B. 455); or on the fourth day, when it was received at a distance in the country, too late to reach the bank on that day, and subsequent delay was occasioned by the holder's inability to leave his business in order to make a deposit in the local bank (Frelberg v. Cody, 55 Mich. 108); so a delay of four days in remitting and returning a check, according to the original understanding of the parties, was excusable (Woodruff v. Plant, 41 Conn. 344); or a delay of five days (Werk v. Mad River Valley Bank, 8 Ohio St. 301); or, in case of a check payable at the drawee's bank, situate in another State, a delay of six days (Bridgeport Bank v. Dyer, 19 Conn. 136; Taylor v. Wilson, 11 Met. 44); or even a delay of forty days, under peculiar circumstances of distance, bad weather, roads, etc. Brown v. Olmsted, 50 Cal. 162.

In general, the time required to send a check to a distant place for payment must be reasonable (Stephens v. McNeill, 26 Barb. 651); and it is sometimes held that, as against the drawer of a check, any time for presentment is reasonable if the drawer is not injured by the delay. Elting v. Brinkerhoff, 2 Hall, 459; Purcell v. Allemon, 22 Gratt. 739; Planter's Bank v. Merritt, 7 Heisk. 177; Smith v. Jones, 2 Bush, 108; Howes v. Austin, 35 Ill. 396.

So if the bank on which a check is drawn suspends payment the next day before the close of banking hours, it would be a sufficient excuse for not presenting the check, although the holder resides in the vicinity. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. v. Collins, 3 Lans. 29. See Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1104.

ment of the check or by such dealing with the check by the plaintiff as would, in judgment of law, convert what was originally a provisional payment into an absolute one. The check was dated August 22, 1887, and was drawn on the Ausbury Park National Bank, and was, on the same day, indorsed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff at the place where the bank was located. The plaintiff, on accepting the check, assumed as between himself and the defendant an obligation to present the same to the bank for payment within the time prescribed by the law-merchant, that is to say, not later than the next day after its date, and if refused to protest the same and give notice of non-payment. Smith v. Jones, 20 Wend. 192. It was not presented until the 31st of August, nine days after it was received by the plaintiff. The defendant was, by such delay, discharged from liability as indorser of the check, irrespective of any question of loss or injury. Presentment in due time, as fixed by the law-merchant, was a condition, upon performance of which the liability of the defendant as indorser depended, and this delay was not excused although the drawer of the check had no funds, or was insolvent, or because presentment would have been unavailing as a means of procuring payment. Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 10 Wend. 304; Gough v. Staats, 18 Wend. 549.

A different rule obtains as between the holder and drawer of a check. As between them, presentment may be made at any time, and delay in presentment does not discharge the liability of the drawer, unless loss to him has resulted. Little v. Phenix Bank, 2 Hill, 425.

The action here is not upon the indorsement of the defendant, but upon the original indebtedness. If the discharge of the defendant's liability as indorser discharges also his liability as debtor for the original debt, the judgment must on that ground be reversed. In Hamilton v. Cunningham, 2 Brock. 350, Chief Justice Marshall considered the effect of the neglect of the holder of a bill to give due notice of dishonor, whereby prior parties thereto were discharged, upon the liability of a debtor for the debt for which the bill was drawn. After showing that the authorities in which the debtor had been held discharged proceeded upon the theory that he had sustained an actual loss, he reached the conclusion that the true principle is "that if a bill be received as provisional payment, the omission to give due notice of its dishonor deprives the creditor of his action on that bill, but does not compel him to take it in absolute payment, or deprive him of his action on the original debt further than damage has been sustained actually or in legal supposition by the debtor." See also Gallagher v. Roberts, 2 Wash. C. C. 191; Flieg v. Sleet, 43 Ohio St. 53.

I am not sure that this doctrine is reconcilable with expressions in the opinion of this court in Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 52 N. Y. 545. That was an action to recover a debt for which the defendant had drawn his draft on J. K. Place & Co., and forwarded it to the plaintiff, the creditor. It was presented on the same day it was received to the drawees, and the plaintiffs received therefor the drawees' check on a bank and surrendered the draft. The check was not presented to the bank until the next day, when payment was refused, the 13 L. R. A.

drawer, meanwhile, having failed. The check would have been paid if it had been presented on the day it was given, which might have been done. The plaintiffs did not demand a return of the draft, and it was not protested, nor was any notice of non-payment given to the drawees. The court rendered judgment for the defendant on two grounds: first, that in the absence of proof of demand and refusal and notice to the drawees, according to the usual course, there could be no recovery upon the draft or upon the indebtedness upon which it was given; and, second, on the ground of negligence in failing to present the check on the day on which it was given. The last ground stated was, upon the facts, a satisfactory basis for the judgment, and the same principle was applied upon similar facts in Meadville First Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 77 N. Y. 320.

In the view we take of the present case, it is unnecessary to inquire whether the cases cited from this and other courts are in conflict, or, if so, which class of cases stands upon the better reason. The court, in this case, directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and in this, we think, there was error. It cannot be doubted that if there was evidence tending to show that the delay in presenting the check to the Asbury Park Bank prevented its collection, or from which the jury might find that the whole or any part of the debt owing by the drawer of the check to the defendant, for which the check was given, was lost by reason of the delay in the presentment or by dealings between the plaintiff and the drawer, in respect to the check, without the assent of the defendant, the case should have been submitted to the jury. To the extent of the injury the law would treat the omission to make due presentment as tantamount to payment.

The facts most favorable to the defendant need to be stated. Woodruff, the maker of the check, was, when the check was given, conducting a hotel at Asbury Park, and the parties to the action were guests at his house. The defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for dentistry work, and the former, who resided in New York, had loaned money to Woodruff for which the check was given, and on the same day the defendant received the check he delivered it to the plaintiff on his debt. Woodruff had an account with the Asbury Park National Bank. On the day of the date of the check the bank charged to his account a demand note held by the bank against him for $500, but, so far as appears, without any notice to Woodruff, and this rendered his bank account overdrawn. Woodruff was in embarrassed circumstances, but was in the daily receipt of about $600 from his business. He used part of the receipts for current expenses, without depositing them, and between the 22d and 31st of August he deposited about $900 in the bank to the credit of his account, and the inference is that it was applied in part to pay the $500 note and in part to pay current checks drawn by Woodruff.

On the 22d of August, the day on which Woodruff's check to the defendant is dated, and after it had been indorsed to the plaintiff by the defendant, Woodruff, who had been informed of the transfer, requested the plaintiff to accommodate him by holding the check a few days, stating as a reason that he was pressed in the payment of his accounts, to which request the plaintiff assented. He asked the plaintiff to let him know when he wished to use the check, as he would then proffer it. Woodruff testified that he had money in his office sufficient to pay the check, and would have paid it at any moment had payment been insisted upon; that he was in the receipt of about $600 a day, and that he redeemed a number of other checks which went to protest at this time; that two or three days after the conversation of the 22d of August, he spoke to the plaintiff again, and the plaintiff informed him that he had sent the check west. Woodruff said to him that he regretted it very much, as he wished to make provision for the check.

The cashier of the bank testified that there were no funds to meet the check, and that it would not have been paid if it had been presented any time after the 22d of August.

On August 31, Woodruff, who was behind in his rent, was dispossessed from the hotel premises and his business was closed, and he then was and now is insolvent. It may be conceded that the only obligation upon the plaintiff as between him and the defendant, was to present the check at the bank for payment within the time prescribed by law, and if payment was refused to have the same protested and notice of non-payment to the defendant. If he had performed this duty the defendant would have been apprised of the default, and he would have had an opportunity to take such measures as he could to secure payment from Woodruff.

One of the objects of requiring prompt notice to be given to indorsers and other parties secondarily liable on commercial paper in case of default, is that they may have an opportunity to secure themselves. Checks are supposed to be drawn against funds of the drawer, and prima facie where it is shown that the drawer's account was not good the inference of injury from non-presentment would be rebutted.

But where, as in this case, it is shown that the maker of the check was solicitous that it should be paid, that he had the means of payment at command, and would have provided for or paid the check if payment had been insisted upon, that the holder was apprised of the facts, and for the accommodation of the maker refrained from presenting the check, and presentation was delayed until open insolvency of the maker occurred, and he became, by the change of circumstances, unable to provide for the check, it cannot be said, we think, that there was no legal evidence of injury to be submitted to the jury.

The plaintiff, instead of taking the usual course, undertook to deal with the maker of the check, in disregard of his primary obligation to the defendant. It was for the jury to pass upon the circumstances, and to find whether the conduct of the plaintiff imposed a pecuniary injury upon the defendant. To the extent of such injury the law adjudges that the debt of the plaintiff has been paid.

The judgment below should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Anson HEATH, Resp't.,

v.

Jefferson S. HEWITT, App't.

(...N. Y....)

A conveyance to the "heirs" of the grantor's son, who has children then living, reserving to him a life estate after life estates in the grantor and another, is a present grant of the fee to the children.

NOTE.—Who are "heirs."

The primary meaning in the law of the word "heirs" is the persons related to one by blood, who would take his real estate if he died intestate, and the word embraces no one not thus related. It is not strictly proper to designate persons who succeeded to the personal estate of an intestate. The proper primary signification of the words "next of kin" is those related by blood, who take personal estate of one who dies intestate, and they bear the same relation to personal estate as the word "heirs" does to real estate. The word "heirs" and "next of kin" would not ordinarily be used by any testator to designate persons who were not related to him by blood. Tillman v. Davis, 95 N. Y. 17.

The word "heirs" at common law is required to be used in limiting a fee simple, where the estate is acquired by conveyance inter vivos. And no equivalent words, which indicate the intention of the grantor to convey an absolute right to the property, will suffice. If the conveyance be not made to one and his heirs, the grantee will take only an estate for his life, notwithstanding the estate is limited L. R. A.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, reversing a judgment in favor of defendant entered in the Cayuga County clerk's office upon the report of a referee in an action brought to recover real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Parker, J.:

Appeal from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, reversing a judgment entered upon the report of a referee dismissing plaintiffs' complaint. This action was brought to recover one equal undivided by such phrases as, "to A forever," or, "to A and his successors," or to his children or issue or assigns, and the like. An express direction that the grantee is to have a fee-simple estate will not supply the place of the word "heirs."—Co. Lit. 8 b; 2 Prest. Est. 3, 8; 4 Kent, Com. 6, note; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 139; Sedgwick v. Laffin, 10 Allen, 430; King v. Barns, 13 Pick. 24; Adams v. Ross, 30 N. J. L. 511; Clearwater v. Rose, 1 Blackf. 137; Foster v. Joice, 3 Wash. C. C. 498; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 88.

But if the estate be acquired by devise or by legislative grant the technical word "heirs" is not necessary. The intention to create a fee-simple estate may in such cases be manifested by any other words or forms of expression. Rutherford v. Greene, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 199, 4 L. ed. 218; Bridgewater v. Bolton, 6 Mod. 109; Newkerk v. Newkerk, 2 Cal. 345; Jackson v. Housel, 17 Johns. 281; Godfrey v. Humphrey, 13 Pick. 537; Baker v. Bridge, 12 Pick. 27; 2 Bl. Com. 109; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 85.

On the other hand, if the word "heirs" appears from the context of the will to have been used by the testator as a word of purchase, it will be give vided eleventh part of certain lands described in the complaint. The plaintiff asserted title by virtue of the following instrument:

"This indenture, made this twenty-eighth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six, between Benjamin Heath, of Locke, Cayuga County, N. Y., of the first part, and the heirs of Warren Heath, of the same place, to be equally divided among them, of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of two hundred and fifty dollars, does grant, bargain, sell, confirm, unto the said party of the second part, and to their heirs and assigns forever, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate on lot No. thirty-three, in the Township of Locke, bounded as follows. On the north and west by lands owned by the heirs of Salmon Heath, deceased, on the south and southwest by the center of the highway, and on the east by lands owned by the said Benjamin Heath, containing about thirteen acres of land, being the same premises deeded to the said party of the first part by Harvey Heath and wife, as by reference to said deed (book 77, p. 619) will more fully appear, excepting and reserving to myself the whole use and absolute control of the said premises during my natural life; and in case, my wife, Naamah, should outlive me, to her during her natural life, and after her decease to my son, Warren, during his natural life. And further, this conveyance is made subject to a certain judgment rendered in favor of Jonas Rude, of two hundred and fifty dollars, the amount of which judgment the said Warren hereby agrees to pay, together with all and singular the hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining, excepting the reserves above mentioned, to have and to hold the said premises above described to the said party of the second part, their heirs and assigns forever; and the said party of the first part for his heirs does covenant, grant, promise, and agree to and with the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, the above-bargained premises against all and every person or persons whatsoever lawfully and equitably claiming or to claim the whole or any part thereof forever to warrant and defend. In witness whereof, the said party of the first part has hereunto set his hand and seal, the day and year first above written. Nota Bene, 2d space from top, the words 'the heirs,' interlined before signing; also, 5th space from bottom the words, 'excepting the reserves above mentioned.'

mark.

Warren Heath was a son of Benjamin Heath, the grantor, and at the date of the instrument had eight children, among whom was the plaintiff. Thereafter three children were born to him, and at the time of the commencement of this action all of his children were living. After the death of Benjamin Heath and his widow, Warren Heath entered into possession of the land described in the deed, and so continued until January 22, 1868, under claim of title as life tenant under the instrument granted. On the day last named Warren Heath and his wife, for a valuable consideration, quitclaimed all their right, title and interest in and to such premises to Harvey Heath. March 1, 1871, Harvey Heath and wife, by a warranty deed, conveyed said lands to Jefferson S. Hewitt, the defendant in this action, who subsequently went into possession that construction, and the devisee will take only a life estate, while his heirs will take a contingent remainder, notwithstanding that ordinarily the rule in Shelley's Case would make it a fee-simple estate in the first devisee. Ulrich's App. 86 Pa. 386, 27 Am. Rep. 707; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 37.

Where a conveyance was made to one, as trustee for his wife and her "present heirs," the words "present heirs" were words of description as to who were to take under the conveyance, and were equivalent to saying the children she had then; and the wife and such children took as tenants in common. Cheese-Carley Co. v. Purlall, 74 Ga. 487.

In the civil law the word "heir" denotes a universal successor in the event of death, he who actively or passively succeeds to the entire property or estate, rights and obligations of a decedent and occupies his place. Black, Law Dict. title Heir, 565.

The term "heir" has several significations. Sometimes it refers to one who has formally accepted a succession and taken possession thereof; sometimes to one who is called to succeed but still retains the faculty of accepting or renouncing, and it is frequently used as applied to one who has formally renounced. Mumford v. Bowman, 26 La. Ann. 417.

In Brown v. Lyon, 6 N. Y. 419, lands were devised to Olive Hall, "to have and to hold to the said Olive during her life, and then to descend to the heirs of her body, and to their heirs and assigns, forever;" and it was held that these words would have, but for the statute, created an estate tail, and by force of the statute the same abolishing all estate tail. Olive Hall, the grantee named, took a fee.

So in the case of Schoonmaker v. Sheely, 8 Denio, 18 L. R. A.

490, the words used in the habendum clause defining the estate of the devisee were "to have and to hold," describing the lands, "unto my said son B. during his natural life, and after his decease to his heirs and to their heirs and assigns, forever," and the same conclusions were reached. That it was the intention of the grantor to create an estate tail in his sister Louisa F. is supported by the following cases: Grout v. Townsend, 2 Denio, 338; Vanderheyden v. Crandall, 2 Denio, 19; Van Rensselaer v. Poucher, 5 Denio, 35; Lott v. Wyckoff, 2 N. Y. 855; Barlow v. Barlow, 2 N. Y. 386; Seaman v. Harvey, 16 Hun, 75; Coe v. Dewitt, 22 Hun, 428.

When a testator uses the word "heirs," as applied to the descendants of a living person, the general rule of the construction is that he intends the children of such person. Carne v. Roch, 4 Moore & P. 862; Darblison v. Beaumont, 1 P. Wms. 229, 3 Bro. P. C. 60; Goodright v. White, 2 W. Bl. 1010; Stimms v. Garrot, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 393; Bowers v. Porter, 4 Pick. 197; Campbell v. Rawdon, 18 N. Y. 418; Heard v. Horton, 1 Denio, 168.

It is well established that when the grantees in a conveyance are mentioned and described as the children of "A.," it is sufficiently certain to make the grant valid, for by the use of that term reference is made to a class of persons in esse, and they can be identified by proper proof. The case of Umfreville v. Keeler, 1 Thomp. & C. 493, is not hostile to the views which we entertain on this proposition and is an authority in support of them. Rivard v. Gisenhof, 35 Hun, 247.

All the works on the law of tenure unite in this proposition, that prima facie the word "heir" is to be taken in strict legal sense; but if there be a plain demonstration in the deed that the grantor used it thereof under said deed, and so continued up to the time of the trial of this action. The referee found, as a conclusion of law, that the deed from Benjamin Heath to "the heirs-at-law of Warren Heath," who was living, was void for uncertainty as to who were the grantees, and directed judgment to be entered dismissing the complaint with costs.

Mr. S. Edwin Day, with Mr. H. Greenfield, for appellant:

The alleged deed was void. Warren Heath was living.

In consequence of the maxim nemo est hæres viventis, an immediate grant to the heirs of A is void.

4 Cruise, Dig. title xxxii. chap. 8, § 17 (vol. 3, ed. 1808, *87); 1 Devlin. Deeds, p. 162, § 185; Rivard v. Gisenhof, 35 Hun, 247; Morris v. Stephens, 46 Pa. 200; Hall v. Leonard, 1 Pick. 27.

The grant was by its terms "immediate," though the grantor undertook to reserve a life estate in the premises to himself, for his own life, and to others for their lives.

Ives v. Van Auken, 34 Barb. 566; Hornbeck v. Westbrook, 9 Johns. 78.

A deed takes effect upon delivery only. Delivery implies acceptance, some act on the part of the recipient.

Jackson v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 418.

There was no proof of its actual delivery, nor was there a presumption of delivery.

Gifford v. Corrigan, 7 Cent. Rep. 277, 105 N. Y. 223; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416.

Mr. W. E. Hughitt, with Mr. W. W. Hare, for respondent:

A most liberal construction will be given a deed in order to carry out the intention of the grantor.

Jackson v. Blodgett, 16 Johns. 172; Kilmer v. Wilson, 49 Barb. 86; Trucker v. Meeks, 52 N. Y. 638.

The surrounding circumstances will be looked into to aid in getting at the grantor's intention.

French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. 96; Bennett v. Culver, 97 N. Y. 256; Coleman v. Beach, 97 N. Y. 554.

The deed recognizes Warren Heath as then living, and therefore does not use the term "heirs" in its usual sense, but as meaning his heirs apparent (his children).

Head v. Horton, 1 Denio, 165; Vannorsdall v. Van Deventer, 51 Barb. 137.

This is a future estate, within the meaning of the Statute, and it is not now necessary that it follow a preceding estate.

Rev. Stat. chap. 1, title 2, pt. 2, §§ 13, 30; Moore v. Little, 41 N. Y. 75; Sheridan v. House, 4 Keyes, 569.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant's contention is that, inasmuch as Warren Heath was living, a grant to his heirs was void for uncertainty, as there were no persons in being who could take under that description. It is essential to the validity of a grant that the parties be named in the deed, or so plainly designated as to distinguish them with certainty; and it is asserted that, as there were no heirs of Warren Heath at the date of the deed, "because no one can be heir during the life of his ancestor" (Broom, Legal Maxims, *522), the grantees were neither named nor designated. Our attention is called to the rule laid down in Cruise's Digest (title 29, chap. 3), where it is said to be "a rule of the common law that no inheritance can vest, nor any person be the actual, complete heir of another, till in a different sense, such different sense may be assigned to it. Ibid.

The word "children" in its primary and natural sense is a word of purchase, but the words "heirs," and "heirs of the body" are, in their primary and natural sense, words of limitation and not of purchase. Schoonmaker v. Sheely, 8 Denio, 490; Re Sanders, 4 Paige, 233, 3 L. ed. 442.

Kent says the term "heirs" must be used as a mere description of one or more individuals, or a new import given to it by superadded or engrafted words of limitation varying its sense and operation, in order to make it a word of purchase. 4 Kent, Com. 222.

A gift, by will, of personal property to the "heirs" of any person in the event of his death is a gift to those who, if such person died intestate, would succeed to his personal property according to law unless the "heirs-at-law" is the person "designated" in the will to take the personal property. Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. Jr. 399; Vaux v. Henderson, 1 Jac. & W. 388, note; Glittings v. McDermott, 2 Myl. & K. 69; Jacobs v. Jacobs, 16 Beav. 557; Low v. Smith, 2 Jur. (N. S.) pt. 1, p. 344; Doody v. Higgins, 2 Kay & J. 729; Re Porter's Trust, 4 Kay & J. 188; Re Philip's Will, L. R. 7 Eq. Cas. 151; Finlayson v. Tatlock, L. R. 9 Eq. Cas. 258; Re Steven's Trusts, L. R. 15 Eq. Cas. 110; Wingfield v. Wingfield, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 658; Croom v. Herring, 4 Hawks, 393; Freeman v. Knight, 2 Ired. Eq. 72; Eddings v. De Beauvoir, 3 H. L. Cas. 524; Re Rootes, 1 Drew & S. 223; Clark v. Cordis, 4 Allen, 466. See 13 L. R. A.

note to Johnson v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 8 L. R. A. 732, 58 Ark. 255.

A recent authority on the subject thus states the law: The fact that a grantee is not described by name will not affect the validity of a deed, if the designation or description be sufficient to distinguish the person intended from the rest of the world. Thus, where a conveyance was made to Margaret W. Pitcher and her children, and to their heirs and assigns forever, it was declared that the number of children in esse could be ascertained, and the maxim would apply, id certum est quod certum reddi potest. The court held that she and her children in esse took as tenants in common. Hamilton v. Pitcher, 53 Mo. 334.

A deed to "P or her heirs" was held good. Hogan v. Page, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 607, 17 L. ed. 854; Ready v. Kearsley, 14 Mich. 225.

A deed is valid which is made to the heirs-at-law of a person deceased. Boone v. Moore, 14 Mo. 420; Shaw v. Loud, 12 Mass. 447. And see Thomas v. Marshfield, 10 Pick. 394.

But a deed made to the living heirs of a person, without specifying the names of the heirs so called, is void, because it is left in uncertainty who are to have the benefit of the conveyance. Morris v. Stephens, 46 Pa. 200; Winslow v. Winslow, 52 Ind. 8; Hall v. Leonard, 1 Pick. 27.

A deed conveying property is not void for uncertainty if it can be shown who were intended, and that they were in life, and capable of taking at the time the deed was executed. Hogg v. Odom, Dudley (Ga.) 185.

In that case the conveyance was to the children of Nancy Jones. Devlin, Deeds, § 184.

the ancestor is previously dead,—nemo est hæres viventis." In Hall v. Leonard, 1 Pick. 27, a grant of land to the heirs of A. B. was held to be void, and in a discussion of the question the court said: "No case has been found to support a grant to a man's heirs, he being living at the time of the grant." So in Morris v. Stephens, 46 Pa. 200, a conveyance by a grantor to "the heirs of his son Andrew," who was then living, was held to be void for uncertainty. In Huss v. Stephens, 51 Pa. 282, the grantor of the deed under consideration was also the grantor in the instrument before the court in Morris v. Stephens, supra. In the Morris Case the deed described the grantees as heirs of Andrew Lautz, Jr., and the consideration expressed was one dollar in money and "the natural love and affection which the grantor hath for said heirs;" while in the Huss Case the grantees were described in the same manner, but the consideration expressed was one dollar and "the natural love and affection he hath for his grandchildren;" the difference in the two cases being that in the latter the word "grand-children" in the consideration clause appears in the place of the word "heirs" in the former. In the first case the deed was held to be void for uncertainty. But the second was declared to constitute a valid grant, because the word "grandchildren" defined what he meant by the use of the word "heirs" in describing the grantees. It enabled the court to ascertain that the word "heirs" was not used in its technical sense, but that by it the grantor intended to describe the children of Andrew Lautz, Jr. In Rivard v. Gisenhof, 35 Hun, 247, the court asserted the general rule that a grant "to the heirs" of a living person is void for uncertainty. And in Umfreville v. Keeler, 1 Thomp. & C. 486, the court recognizes the doctrine of the cases cited, but held that a deed to "E. U., wife of A. U., and her heirs, the children of said A. U.," was valid, and operated to pass title to the children, because it was manifestly the intention of the grantor to confine the interest conveyed to the children of the parties named, notwithstanding the use of the word "heirs." The legal and well-understood meaning of the word "heir" is, the one upon whom is cast an estate of inheritance, upon the death of the owner; and it follows that this person is uncertain until death occurs, for until that event it can never be known to whom the estate will fall. Hence the doctrine of the cases referred to, and which, so far as we have observed, stand unquestioned. If, then, the word "heirs" in this instrument be held to have been employed in its technical sense, it would follow that the deed should be declared void for uncertainty. The courts of this State do not appear to have been called upon in the case of a deed to determine whether, in the light of other facts appearing in the deed, and the circumstances surrounding its execution, the word "heirs" may not be construed as meaning children of such living person, if it appears that such was manifestly the intention of the grantor. But in the construction of wills the question has been considered. In Heard v. Horton, 1 Denio, 165, the testator, after making sundry bequests and devises, and, among others, to his son J. B. H., devised the residue of his real estate without words of perpetuity to his son J. H., on condition that he should pay his debts; and added that, if J. H. should die without issue, at his decease the real estate should be equally divided among the heirs of his son J. B. H. It was held that the words "heirs of J. B. H.," he having children living at the time of making the will, sufficiently designated these children as the executory devisees, though J. B. H. was himself then living, he being referred to in the will as a living person. Judge Beardsley, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Where the will recognizes the ancestor as living, and makes a devise to his heir, eo nomine, this shows that the term was not used in the strictest sense, but as meaning the heir apparent of the ancestor named." Now, in this case, Warren Heath was living at the time of the making of the deed, which fact sufficiently appears in the deed, because the grantor reserved to him a life-estate in the lands sought to be conveyed; and he had children living, among whom was the plaintiff in this action. In Van-norsdall v. Van Deventer, 51 Barb. 187, the devise was to the legal heirs of his (testator's) brother A., deceased, and to the legal heirs of his sister M., deceased, and to the heirs of his brother-in-law W. V. At testator's death, W. V. was still living. It was held that the word "heirs," in so far as it related to the heirs of his brother-in-law W. V., was used as synonymous with the word "children," for the will assumes that he was then living; that the children of W. V. were entitled to take, and that the estate became vested in them immediately upon the death of the testator. These cases were cited with approval in Cushman v. Horton, 59 N. Y. 149, in which the rule is laid down that to the word "heirs" must be given the ordinary legal meaning, unless it appears that the testator used the word in other than the primary legal sense, in which event courts should give effect to the intention of the testator. If it be said that both in England and in this country the courts have more generally supported indefinite forms of transmissions by will than by grant, because in the case of wills they are intended to go into effect at a future time, and to provide for future and uncertain events, not only for individuals named, but also for described classes of donees, to be ascertained by evidence at the death of the testator or afterwards, while in the case of the present conveyance the very nature of the act excludes the necessity of indefiniteness, it may be answered that this difference is not of moment in determining whether the particular rule of construction adopted in the cases cited is applicable here. The determination made was that, if from the whole will it was manifest that in using the word "heirs" the testator meant "children" the court should so construe it, and thus give effect to the intention of the testator. But the Statute also requires the court to give effect to the intent of the grantor in making the conveyance before us, if it may be done consistently with the rules of law. It provides that, "in the construction of every instrument creating or conveying or authorizing the creation or conveyance of any estate or interest in lands, it shall be the duty of courts of justice to carry into effect the intent of the parties, so far as such intent can be collected from the whole instrument, and is consistent with the rules of law." 1 Rev. Stat. Edmond's ed. p. 699, § 2. As the intent of the parties is to govern in grants as well as wills, there seems to be no basis on which to found a distinction between them as to the interpretation to be given to the word "heirs," if in the one case as in the other it appears that it was not the intention of the grantor or testator to use it in its ordinary legal sense. We are then to ascertain whether the grantor intended by the words "the heirs of Warren Heath" to designate and describe the children of Warren Heath as his grantees. It has been determined in many cases that the word "heirs," notwithstanding its primary and well-understood meaning, is susceptible of more than one interpretation. Heard v. Horton, Vannorsdall v. Van Deventer, Cushman v. Horton, supra. And in determining which must be here given we may look at the surrounding circumstances existing when the contract was entered into, the situation of the parties, and the subject matter of the instrument. French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. 96; Coleman v. Beach, 97 N. Y. 545-553. At the date of the instrument Warren Heath had eight children, who were also the grand-children of Benjamin Heath, the grantor. Warren Heath was not only living, but the deed distinctly recognizes that fact, in that: first, it recites that the "conveyance is made subject to a certain judgment rendered in favor of Jonas Rude of $250, the amount of which judgment the said Warren hereby agrees to pay;" and, second, the instrument undertakes to reserve "the whole use and absolute control of the said premises . . . to my son Warren during his life."

These facts bring the question before us within the rule laid down in Heard v. Horton and other cases cited supra, that when a will recognizes the ancestor as living, and makes a devise to his heir in that name, it shows that the term was used as meaning the heir apparent of the ancestor named; or, as stated in the Vannorsdall Case, that the word "heirs" was used as synonymous with the word "children." That he intended to describe the children of his son Warren as his grantees is further supported by the fact that the grant is by its terms immediate, the grantor undertaking to reserve a life estate in the premises to himself and to others for their lives. The conveyance was not to Warren Heath for life, and, after his death, to his heirs, but it constituted a present grant to persons whom the grantor designated as the heirs of Warren Heath, with an attempted reservation for the benefit of Warren, and the only persons answering that description in any sense in which the word is employed, whether technically or popularly, would be the children of Warren.

The order should be affirmed, and judgment absolute rendered against the appellant, with costs.

All concur, except Bradley and Haight, JJ., not sitting.

The sale of a lot on which half of a party-wall is standing is a use of the wall by the owner within the meaning of his contract to pay half its value when he used the wall.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court of Travis County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover defendant's proportion of the cost of a party-wall. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Walton, Hill & Walton, for appellant:

The petition does not allege a breach of the contract, which it sets out as the foundation of the suit; there being no allegation of an express or implied contract on the part of Nalle to use the wall, his act in parting with it was not a breach of the contract set up, and the court erred in not sustaining his exceptions to the petition.

As to construction of the contract, see opinion on former appeal.

As to party-wall contract, see—

Cole v. Hughes, 54 N. Y. 444, 13 Am. Rep. 613.

Whether any implied contract arises in case of party-wall built without agreement, see—Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 620, note 3; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 710.

The court not having found that defendant Nalle agreed either expressly or impliedly to build or otherwise use the wall, and not having found that said Nalle was bound under the agreement not to sell his lot, the fact of sale and consequent inability on the part of Nalle to use the wall constitutes no breach of the contract found by the court as the basis of its judgment.

Messrs. Sheeks & Sheeks for appellee.

Marr, J., filed the following opinion:

The statement of the case is taken from the brief of appellant: "Appellee brought this action originally against appellant and George Schuworth for the recovery of half the value of a party-wall. He recovered judgment against both, which judgment, on appeal, was reversed by this court. The case having been referred to and decided by commissioners of appeals on agreement of parties (Nalle v. Paggi (Tex.) 1 L. R. A. 83), appellee dismissed as to Schuworth, and amended his petition so as to charge Nalle alone on alleged contract to pay for half the party-wall. Trial by the court resulted in judgment, March 15, 1889, against appellant for $627.80, half the value of the wall and interest. The court filed findings of fact and conclusions of law. Appellant had exceptions noted, and gave notice of, and perfected appeal."

NOTE.—See note to Harbor v. Evans (Mo.) 10 L. R. A. 41. Also Fowler v. Saks (D. C.) 7 L. R. A. 649, and Nalle v. Paggi (Tex.) 1 L. R. A. 33.

That portion of plaintiff's petition challenged by the exceptions interposed by appellant, and overruled in the court below, is as follows:

"That on or about the said 4th day of August, 1875, the defendant and the petitioner made and entered into a parol contract by which it was agreed that petitioner might build a wall, to be a partition wall, on the line between their two tracts of land so owned by them as aforesaid; that in so doing he might extend the foundation thereof one foot upon the land of defendant, and should extend one foot upon the land of petitioner, so as to have one half of the foundation and wall upon the land of defendant, and one half thereof on the land of petitioner, and that as soon as defendant desired to use said wall he would pay one half of the value thereof to the petitioner."

The objection to the petition, as made by the defendant, is that Nalle was only to become liable in the event that "he desired to use said wall;" and the petition fails to show the happening of this contingency. The petition, however, further alleges elsewhere "that afterwards, to wit, in October, 1883, the defendant sold and conveyed his part of the lot to one George Schuworth, who has improved the same, and who began to use said partition wall at that time, has been ever since, and still is, using the same as the vendee of defendant, and thereby rendered it out of his (defendant's) power to use said wall himself, though he and his said vendee derived the full benefit thereof."

There is no need of considering the several assignments of error separately, or the action of the court upon the demurrers apart from the conclusions of law. There is but one question presented, and to be determined, in our estimate of the record. Do the facts as alleged and proven show the liability of the appellant to pay for one half of the cost or value of the partition wall erected by the appellee? The findings of the court are as follows: "(1) In 1875, plaintiff and defendant, Nalle, owned adjoining lots on Pecan Street, in the City of Austin, and in that year plaintiff built a partition wall upon the division line between said lots, as alleged in his petition, one half on his, and the other half on Nalle's lot, which wall was and is worth $1,000. (2) The wall was placed over on Nalle's lot by plaintiff on an understanding or agreement had between them that when Nalle used the wall he would do what was right about it in the way of compensating plaintiff; he (Nalle) then expecting to build a house on his lot. This understanding was had before the foundation was finished. (3) In October, 1884, Nalle sold his lot to one Schuworth, who knew the wall was over on his lot, and, while he was still owing Nalle $1,500 on the lot, Paggi made known to him his claim for building half of the wall, and he refused to pay for it, and Nalle has also refused to pay for it. In 1884, after his purchase, Schuworth built a house upon the lot, using about thirty feet of the partition wall as one side of his house. Conclusions of law: On appeal from a former judgment in this case, it was held, on the same state of facts as above found, that Schuworth was not liable, and plaintiff had dismissed as to him. As to the liability of defendant, Nalle, this court holds, upon the facts, that as the plaintiff erected the partition wall upon the understanding that Nalle would do what was right about it when he used it, and as Nalle, after the completion of the wall, sold the lot, and put it out of his power to use it, and in the power of another to get the benefit of said wall without paying plaintiff for it, therefore Nalle is bound to pay plaintiff one half of its value, or the sum of $500, and, as his liability rose when he sold the lot in 1884, this sum should draw interest at eight per cent from January 1, 1885."

Appellant contends that, upon the facts found by the court below, it should have rendered judgment in his favor, because, he says, as it was optional with him to use the wall, and as he never builded on the lot, nor used the wall as contemplated by the agreement, the contingency in which he would become liable to make compensation for one half of the wall has not yet arisen. To this we cannot accede, but, on the contrary, concur in the conclusions of the district court. When the wall was erected, or rather being erected, Nalle agreed with Paggi to "do what was right about it in the way of compensating him" whenever the former should use the wall; and we think a use of the wall by appellant at some time was undoubtedly contemplated. Here, then, is an express agreement or promise to pay, conditional only upon the use of the wall by Nalle in any way. The wall was erected with his consent, and for at least his prospective benefit, and was placed as much on his land as on that of the appellee. His liability did not necessarily, as we think, depend upon the erection of a building by him on his own lot, connected with the wall, although that undoubtedly would have been a use thereof. His vendee, however, has made such use of a part of the wall. By selling his lot to another, carrying with it the right to use the wall, or at least depriving himself of such right, the appellant effectually put it out of his power to build to the wall, or use it in any other mode. By his own voluntary act he thus put it out of his power to make any direct use of the wall as originally contemplated, and therefore prevented the happening of the contingency in which he was to make compensation even if we suppose that the sale of the lot was not a use of the wall. Where a party thus renders impossible the performance of the contract upon his own part, to the detriment of the other contracting party, there can be no doubt of his liability under the contract, and that a right of action against him immediately ac-crues. Phillips v. Herndon, 78 Tex. 378; Dugan v. Anderson, 86 Md. 567, 11 Am. Rep. 509. It would be unconscionable to allow one of the parties to a contract to receive the benefits thereof, and then repudiate it with impunity. But we are further of the opinion that the sale of the lot by the appellant to Schuworth, carrying with it one half of the wall erected by the appellee at his own expense for the joint benefit of both lots, was a use of the wall by Nalle, within the meaning of the contract, and thereby fixed his liability. It must be supposed that he was paid for his interest in the wall, or took that into consideration, when he conveyed to Schuworth. He had agreed to do "what was right" when he should use the wall. The right thing to do was to pay one half of the value thereof to Paggi. This he did not do, though he has used the wall, and reaped some of the benefits, as we must presume, of its erection. The wall having been built partly on Nalle's land with his consent, and thus made a part thereof, to his benefit, with an expectation upon the part of Paggi that he would be compensated proportionally, a promise to do so upon the part of Nalle might be implied under the circumstances, were there no express agreement to that effect, particularly as he not only got the benefit of the wall himself, as we have seen, but, by the sale of the lot, authorized Schuworth to use the wall, and the latter has made the very use thereof which appellant contends was originally contemplated. Qui facit per alium facit per se, quoted by the appellee, might well be applied. We have carefully examined the facts, and read with interest the brief and argument for appellant, but have been unable to discover any principle of law applicable to the case that would justify the conclusion that his liability to make compensation has never arisen. We are of the opinion that upon the plainest principles of justice, and according to the authorities, appellant would be liable to the appellee to the extent determined by the district court, either upon his express agreement or promise, or, if necessary to support the judgment below, upon such promise to pay as might be legally implied from the acts and understanding of the parties under the circumstances of the case. Vide Richardson v. Tobey, 121 Mass. 457; Huck v. Flentye, 80 Ill. 258; Day v. Caton, 119 Mass. 514.

We conclude that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Adopted by Supreme Court, May 29, 1891.

v.

Peter S. J. TALBOT.

(....Mass.....)

The right to show that the obligation growing out of an indorsement of a promissory note is not absolute, but depends upon a collateral oral agreement, relates to the nature and validity of the contract and not to the remedy, and is governed by the lex loci contractus.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County

NOTE.—Parol evidence as affecting indorsement.

While it is elementary law that parol evidence is incompetent to vary the terms of a written instrument, still it is equally well settled that, as between the original parties to commercial paper, such proof is admissible as will have a tendency to establish the character in which an indorser intended that he should be bound; and proof of this intention will countervail the prima facie presumptions which the law indulges with reference to the paper. Riley v. Gerrish, 9 Cush. 104; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355; Owings v. Baker, 54 Md. 82; Nurre v. Chittenden, 56 Ind. 465; Pierse v. Irvine, 1 Minn. 369; Strong v. Riker, 16 Vt. 556; Quin v. Sterne, 26 Ga. 224; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 95, 24 L. ed. 348.

Note takes effect from delivery.

Like a deed or other written contract, a promissory note takes effect from delivery, and, as the delivery is something that occurs subsequently to the execution of the instrument, it must necessarily be a question of fact when the delivery was made. Parol evidence is therefore admissible to show when that took place, as it cannot appear in the terms of the note. 2 Taylor, Ev. 6th ed. 1001; Hull v. Cazenove, 4 East, 477; Cooper v. Robinson, 10 Mees. & W. 694.

Presumptions are seldom, if ever, conclusive, at least when applied to commercial paper, except in favor of subsequent bona fide holders for value, before maturity and without notice. As between 18 L. R. A.

the original parties to the paper, parol evidence is competent to explain the contractual relation and the equities it involves. Smith v. Morrill, 54 Me. 48; Mendenhall v. Davis, 72 N. C. 150; Ross v. Espy, 66 Pa. 481; Maxwell v. Van Sant, 46 Ill. 58.

The principle above cited obtains in cases of blank indorsement of a non-negotiable note. Jacques v. McKnight, 26 N. J. L. 92, note.

By statutory provision, in Georgia, all blank indorsements are subject to explanation by oral evidence as between the immediate parties to the paper. Code, § 3808.

But there is a formidable array of authority to the effect that blank indorsements of commercial paper are perfected contracts in writing, and cannot be varied or altered by the interposition of parol proof. Stack v. Beach, 74 Ind. 511; Day v. Thompson, 65 Ala. 269; Charles v. Denis, 42 Wis. 56; Schnell v. North Side P. Mill Co., 89 Ill. 581; Barnard v. Gaslin, 23 Minn. 192; Barry v. Morse, 3 N. H. 132; Bank of Albion v. Smith, 27 Barb. 489.

The principle is that all previous and contemporaneous negotiations and undertakings are merged in the writing and its legal import. The undertaking of an indorser may be either limited or enlarged at the time it is entered into, by express terms, at the pleasure of the indorsers. But if no such terms are expressed in the indorsement, the law fixes the character of the undertaking, and it cannot be varied by parol. Bank of Albion v. Smith, supra.

made during the trial of an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as indorser of certain promissory notes, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Gaston & Whitney, for respondent:

There was no objection to the evidence by which the oral agreement was sought to be proved except so far as the oral agreement itself was claimed to be inadmissible. The ruling was as to the materiality of the thing sought to be proved, and not as to the manner in which the respondent sought to prove it.

See The Gotano and Maria, L. R. 7 Prob. Div. 137, 144, 149.

The indorsement of the respondent was made and took effect and was to be performed in the State of Vermont. The obligation, interpretation and effect of said contract and the liability of the respondent under it, were therefore to be determined by the law of Vermont.

Williams v. Wade, 1 Met. 82; Bank of Illinois v. Brady, 3 McLean, 268; Powers v. Lynch, 3 Mass. 77; Trimby v. Vignier, 1 Bing. N. C. 151; Burrows v. Jemino, 2 Strange, 783; Shoe & Leather Nat. Bank v. Wood, 3 New Eng. Rep. 118, 142 Mass. 563.

What may and may not be shown.

The entire contract is the writing as understood, delivered and received, and it is to be gathered from the language, usages, course of business and relation of the parties. Byles, Bills, 155.

So, one who indorses commercial paper in blank is precluded from showing, even in a suit by his indorsee, that the indorsement was sans recourse. Mason v. Burton, 54 Ill. 349; Skinner v. Church, 36 Iowa, 91; Campbell v. Robbins, 29 Ind. 271; Charles v. Dennis, 42 Wis. 55.

On the other hand, it is competent to show a contemporaneous written agreement as evidence to the fact that the indorsement was intended to be without recourse. Davis v. Brown, 44 U. S. 423, 24 L. ed. 204.

So an indorser cannot show, in an action against his immediate indorsee, that his indorsement was made merely for the purpose of transfer. Dunn v. Ghost, 5 Colo. 124.

Generally speaking, an indorser may prove, as against his immediate indorsee, that a blank indorsement was made for the purpose of collection. Downer v. Chesebrough, 36 Conn. 39; McWhirt v. McKee, 6 Kan. 412.

Some of the authorities maintain that parol evidence is inadmissible to control the construction of an irregular indorsement as against bona fide purchasers for value; that such evidence is only admissible as between immediate parties to the transaction. Houston v. Bruner, 39 Ind. 383; Browning v. Merritt, 61 Ind. 425; Schneider v. Schiffman, 20 Mo. 571.

In Missouri, it is also held to be admissible against an indorsee after maturity. Seymour v. Farrell, 51 Mo. 95.

But the better opinion is that, in every case where the signature on the back is in an ambiguous position, and the meaning can only be definitely ascertained by parol evidence, then parol evidence is admissible to prove its true character, even against a purchaser for value, for he can reasonably be charged with notice of this ambiguity. Greenough v. Smead, 2 Ohio St. 415; Thacher v. Stevens, 46 Conn. 551. See Rey v. Simpson, 68 U. S. 22 How. 341, 13 L. R. A.

It is inconceivable that the respondent is to be subjected to loss and to be held liable on a different contract from that which he actually made, because the plaintiff bank has brought suit in a jurisdiction where the law governing blank indorsements is different from that where the present contract was made.

See Williams v. Wade, 1 Met. 82. See also Vermont State Bank v. Porter, 5 Day, 816; Koster v. Merritt, 32 Conn. 246; Denny v. Williams, 5 Allen, 1; Van Cleef v. Therasson, 3 Pick. 12; Dunn v. Welsh, 62 Ga. 241.

Mr. Melvin O. Adams, for plaintiff:

The ruling of the court, that the lex fori must govern the case; that as all the evidence of the alleged agreement between plaintiff and defendant tended to prove that the same was oral, evidence of such oral agreement was inadmissible and immaterial upon any of the issues, was correct.

As to the lex fori, see—

Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304-307; Downer v. Chesebrough, 36 Conn. 39; Bain v. Whitehaven & F. J. R. Co. 3 H. L. Cas. 1; Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801.

As to the evidence of such oral agreement, see—

Adams v. Wilson, 12 Met. 198; Hanchet v. Birge, Id. 545; Underwood v. Simonds, Id. 275, 277; Wright v. Morse, 9 Gray, 337.

16 L. ed. 280; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 95, 24 L. ed. 343; Cavazos v. Trevino, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 773, 18 L. ed. 813; Frank v. Lillienfeld, 38 Gratt. 377; Denton v. Peters, L. R. 5 Q. B. 475.

Exceptions to the general rule.

There are a few exceptions to the general rule. The exceptions are principally of three classes:

First, it is always competent to show by parol evidence that the indorsement was made without consideration, as, for example, that it was made for the accommodation of the indorsee. Breneman v. Furness, 90 Pa. 186; Hamburger v. Miller, 48 Md. 825; Morris v. Faurot, 21 Ohio St. 155; Cole v. Smith, 29 La. Ann. 551; Davis v. Morgan, 64 N. C. 570; Lovejoy v. Citizens Bank, 23 Kan. 381; Kirkham v. Boston, 67 Ill. 599; McCoon v. Biggs, 2 Hill, 121; Denniston v. Bacon, 10 Johns. 198; Foster v. Jolly, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 703.

Subsequent failure of consideration may be shown by parol evidence, as well as by an original want of consideration. Smith v. Carter, 25 Wis. 283.

So can partial failure or want of consideration be proved by parol evidence. Cook v. Cockrill, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 475.

It can also be shown that the consideration was certain payments to be made by the indorsee, the liability upon the indorsement being conditional upon making these payments. Scammon v. Adams, 11 Ill. 575; Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. 477.

Secondly, it may be shown that the indorsement was made in trust to the indorsee for the purpose of carrying out some purpose of the indorser, as his agent, or as a trustee. Thus, for example, it can be shown that the indorsement was made "for collection" only. Lawrence v. Stonington Bank, 6 Conn. 521; Dale v. Gear, 38 Conn. 15, 39 Conn. 39; Lewis v. Dunlap, 72 Mo. 173; Smith v. Childress, 27 Ark. 323; Ricketts v. Pendleton, 14 Md. 320; Hamburger v. Miller, 48 Md. 825; Hill v. Ely, 5 Serg. & R. 363; Manley v. Boycot, 2 El. & Bl. 46; Martin v. Cole, 3 Colo. 114; Downer v. Chesebrough, 36 Conn. 39. But see Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 N. J. L. 521; Johnson v. Ramsey, 43 N. J. L. 279.

But it is not possible, on the other hand, to show

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks to recover in this suit from the defendant as indorser on five promissory notes and to reach and apply in payment of them the interest of the defendant in a partnership of which he is a member. The notes were made by the Esperanza Marble Company, and were indorsed in blank by it and the defendant and two other parties, and were all made payable at what we assume to be the plaintiff Bank in Rutland, Vt. This suit is against the defendant alone. The respondent in his answer claims that his indorsement was made and took effect as a contract in the State of Vermont and that by the law of that State his obligation depended, as between the plaintiff and himself or any other party taking the notes with notice, upon the understanding or agreement between the bank and himself in regard to said indorsement, and that his indorsement was in fact made subject to an oral agreement with the plaintiff set out in his answer, which he has fully performed. At the time the respondent offered testimony tending to prove the alleged oral agreement. The court received it de bene, and at the conclusion of all the testimony ruled that the lex fori, and not the lex loci contractus, must govern the case; that the oral agreement and the evidence tending to prove it were inadmissible and immaterial and could not be considered by the jury. The respondent excepted to this ruling and the question before us is as to its correctness.

The testimony introduced by the plaintiff tended to show the following, among other facts in regard to his indorsement of the notes in suit. In January, 1887, the plaintiff Bank had over-due notes which it had discounted for the Esperanza Marble Company of New York, but which had its usual place of business in Rutland. Part of these notes were indorsed by respondent. The plaintiff also held a mortgage on certain property in New York as collateral to these notes, but found it inconvenient to attend to its collection and requested the respondent to attend to it in its behalf, and it was orally agreed between the respondent and the plaintiff that the mortgage should be assigned to the respondent and that he should collect the same and pay over the proceeds to the Bank. It was also orally agreed that the notes held by the Bank against the marble company should be surrendered to it and new notes given by it therefor, which should be indorsed by the respondent and the other two parties whose names are on the notes in suit, and that the notes should be renewed from time to time as they fell due, the renewals being indorsed by the same parties, until the total amount collectible on the mortgage had been received and paid over by the respondent to the plaintiff Bank. It was further orally by parol evidence that an indorsement, expressed to be "for collection," was intended to pass title (White v. Miners Nat. Bank of Georgetown, 102 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 250; Leary v. Blanchard, 48 Me. 268; Canton First Nat. Bank v. McCann, 4 Ill. App. 250; Armour Bros. Bkg. Co. v. Riley County Bank, 30 Kan. 163; Rock County Nat. Bank v. Hollister, 21 Minn. 385; Third Nat. Bank v. Clark, 23 Minn. 238); as an escrow upon an express condition not yet performed (Chaddock v. Vanness, supra; Bell v. Ingestre, 12 Q. B. 317; Goggerley v. Cuthbert, 2 Bos. & P. 170; Wallis v. Littell, 11 C. B. N. S. 369; Ricketts v. Pendleton, 14 Md. 320), or to enable a transfer for any other special purpose. Pollock v. Bradbury, 8 Moore, P. C. 227; Bell v. Ingestre, 12 Q. B. 317; Adams v. Jones, 12 Ad. & El. 455; Dale v. Gear, 38 Conn. 15; Hamburger v. Miller, 48 Md. 325; Scammon v. Adams, 11 Ill. 578; Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 N. J. L. 520; Mendenhall v. Davis, 72 N. C. 150; Iredell County Comrs. v. Wasson, 82 N. C. 306; Girard Bank v. Comley, 2 Miles, 405; Patterson v. Todd, 18 Pa. 423; Patten v. Pearson, 57 Me. 423; Lynch v. Goldsmith, 64 Ga. 42; Hardy v. White, 60 Ga. 455. But see, contra, Lee v. Pile, 37 Ind. 107; Dunn v. Ghost, 5 Colo. 124.

Parol evidence is not admissible to show this fact in a suit by a bona fide holder. Lewis v. Dunlap, 72 Mo. 174; Stapler v. Burns, 43 Ga. 382; Meador v. Dollar Sav. Bank, 56 Ga. 605.

Thirdly, it may always be shown by parol evidence that the indorsement was procured by fraud, accident or mistake. Kirkham v. Boston, 67 Ill. 596; Lewis v. Dunlap, 72 Mo. 173; Hamburger v. Miller, 48 Md. 325; Hill v. Ely, 5 Serg. & R. 363; Breneman v. Furniss, 30 Pa. 138; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 274. See note to Kulenkamp v. Groff (Mich.) 1 L. R. A. 594.

Lex loci contractus.

A promissory note made and signed in another State, and payable there, although sent by mail to the payee in Massachusetts, is executed in and to be governed by the law of the other State. Shoe 13 L. R. A.

& Leather Nat. Bank v. Wood, 3 New Eng. Rep. 118, 142 Mass. 567.

The principle is also well-settled that a voluntary conveyance of personal property, good by the law of the place where it was made, passes title where-soever the property may be situated. Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 224.

The rule is laid down in Edgerly v. Bush, 31 N. Y. 203, by Folger, Ch. J., as follows: "The law of the domicile of the owner of personal property, as a general rule, determines the validity of every transfer made of it by him."

It may be affirmed, as a general proposition, that the validity of a contract relative to negotiable paper is, in all instances, determined by the law where it is made. Armour v. McMichael, 36 N. J. L. 92, 94; Cothel v. Blydenburgh, 5 N. J. Eq. 17; Woodruff v. Hill, 118 Mass. 310; McDougald v. Rutherford, 30 Ala. 253.

Commercial paper is governed by the same rules applicable to other contracts, in so far as it is placed within the law prevailing within the jurisdiction where it is uttered. The law of that jurisdiction governs the contract, provided it is not against the public morals or policy of the particular State where it is to be enforced. See Byles, Bills, 402; Story, Conf. L. § 242.

Where a written contract is complete, the place of its delivery is, in legal contemplation, the place where it was made. Freese v. Brownell, 35 N. J. L. 235; Campbell v. Nichols, 33 N. J. L. 81; Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 N. Y. 236; Second Nat. Bank v. Smoot, 2 MacArth. 371.

The delivery completes the contract, and controls the date, as well as the mere place of drawing the instrument. Hyde v. Goodnow, supra; Connor v. Donnell, 55 Tex. 167; Findlay v. Hall, 12 Ohio St. 610.

As to the incompetency of parol evidence to vary the terms of a written contract, see notes to Diven v. Johnson (Ind.) 3 L. R. A. 303; Bulkley v. Devine (Ill.) 3 L. R. A. 330; Ferguson v. Bafferty (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 28.

agreed that the respondent should not be liable on his indorsements beyond the amount which he might receive on account of the mortgage and fail to pay over to the plaintiff, and that he should be held liable on his indorsements only to secure the performance of his agreement to collect and pay over on account of the mortgage. The agreement thus made was carried out. The over-due notes of the marble company were surrendered to it and new notes indorsed by the respondent and the other parties taken in their stead. These have been renewed from time to time, the renewals being indorsed by the same parties, and the notes in suit are renewals of said original notes. The notes have all been made payable to the plaintiff Bank in Rutland and the respondent's indorsement upon all of them was made and took effect as a contract made in Vermont. The mortgage was assigned to the respondent and he has paid over to the plaintiff Bank all money which he has collected under it.

At the trial the jury found by direction of the court that the notes in suit were made payable in the State of Vermont, and that respondent's indorsement was made and took effect as a contract in that State.

It is apparent that if the lex fori is to govern the respondent cannot avail himself of the oral agreement entered into between the plaintiff and himself. Adams v. Wilson, 12 Met. 138; Wright v. Morse, 9 Gray, 337. We do not think, however, that it should govern. It is clear that in all that relates to the contract itself, to its nature and validity and interpretation, the law of the place where it is made governs. Shoe & Leather Nat. Bank v. Wood, 142 Mass. 563, 3 New Eng. Rep. 118; Miliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374; Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Met. 381; Nichols v. Mase, 94 N. Y. 160; Buzzell v. Cummings, 61 Vt. 213; Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 128 Pa. 218, 5 L. R. A. 508; Liverpool & Globe W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 453, 32 L. ed. 796; Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co., 153 Mass. —, 12 L. R. A. 340.

And the law of the place where the contract is made is without any express assent or agreement of the parties incorporated into and forms a part of the contract. Their contract is presumed to be made with reference to the law of the place where it is entered into, unless it appears that it was entered into with reference to the law of some other State or country. Washington Cent. Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 207, 32 L. ed. 376; Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74.

A contract valid in the State or country where it is made will be enforced even in a State or country where it would be invalid, provided it be not there contrary to public policy or morals. Parsons v. Trask, 7 Gray, 473; Miliken v. Pratt and Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra.

On the other hand, it is equally clear that in all that relates to the procedure for enforcing the contract the law of the forum controls. Shoe & Leather Nat. Bank v. Wood and Carnegie v. Morrison, supra; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co., 115 Mass. 304.

Thus the form in which and the parties by or against whom the action shall be brought, the competency of the evidence offered to establish the alleged cause of action, whether the cause of action is barred by the Statutes of Limitation, whether a party can maintain an action in his own name or is obliged to use that of another, whether a contract is negotiable, and whether it is to be sued on as a specialty or a simple contract, with many other similar things, have been held to be matters affecting the remedy and therefore to be governed by the lex fori. Pearsall v. Dwight, 2 Mass. 84; Orr v. Amory, 11 Mass. 25; Foss v. Nutting, 14 Gray, 484; Leach v. Greene, 116 Mass. 534; Drake v. Rice, 130 Mass. 410; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co., 115 Mass. 304; McClees v. Burt, 5 Met. 198; Richardson v. New York Cent. R. Co., 98 Mass. 85; Downer v. Cheesbrough, 36 Conn. 39; Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801; Stoneman v. Erie R. Co., 52 N. Y. 429.

It is sometimes difficult to decide whether the question raised in a given case relates to the nature and validity of the contract or to the remedy upon it. We think in the present instance it relates to the former and not to the latter. The respondent claimed that under the laws of Vermont his obligation growing out of his indorsements was not an absolute one, but depended as between the parties upon the oral agreement or understanding, if any, between them at the time when he placed his name upon the notes. The respondent further claimed that when he placed his name upon the notes he did so under an oral agreement with the plaintiff Bank by the terms of which his indorsement was only to be regarded as security for the payment by him to the Bank of the money that he might collect on the mortgage which was assigned to him. Assuming, as we must for the purposes of this case, that the law of Vermont was as stated by the respondent, the testimony offered by him bore clearly upon the nature and validity of the contract between himself and the Bank. The respondent could not show what the agreement was in any other way than that in which he offered to show it. It was not an attempt on his part to vary a written contract, because under the laws of Vermont the indorsement did not of itself constitute an absolute contract; but in order to determine what the contract was it was necessary to ascertain what agreements or undertakings were entered into at the time of and in connection with and as part of the indorsement. If there were none, then the contract between the plaintiff and respondent was the usual contract growing out of a blank indorsement. If there were such undertakings or agreements, then they entered into and formed a part of the contract of indorsement. The evidence was rejected, not because it would have been incompetent to prove the facts which it was offered to establish had the contract been valid in this State, but on the ground that it related to a matter affecting the remedy. Back of all questions of remedy, however, lies the question of the contract itself, and we think the evidence should have been allowed as bearing upon that fact. See Williams v. Wade, 1 Met. 32; Powers v.

Lynsh, 3 Mass. 77; Trimbey v. Vignier, 1 Bing. N. C. 151; Burrows v. Jemino, 2 Strange, 739; Shoe & Leather Nat. Bank v. Wood, supra; Watson v. Campbell, 38 N. Y. 153; Dunn v. Welsh, 62 Ga. 241; Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra.

The plaintiff objects that there was no issue framed upon the laws of Vermont. But the ruling of the court rendered such an issue immaterial; besides an issue could at any time have been framed in the discretion of the court if satisfied that justice required that it should be done or the court could hear and pass upon the question itself. Atlanta Mills v. Mason, 120 Mass. 244.

Frederick H. RINDGE.

(....Mass....)

An action to enforce the liability of a stockholder under the laws of another State, in which the corporation was organized

NOTE.—Effect of statutory enactment.

The liability of stockholders in a corporation of a foreign State, or of one of the United States, must be determined by the laws of that State. Hutchins v. New England Coal Min. Co. 4 Allen, 580; Jones v. Sisson, 6 Gray, 288; Penobscot & K. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 12 Gray, 244; Blackstone Mfg. Co. v. Blackstone, 13 Gray, 488.

That the statutes of a State do not operate with extraterritorial force will be conceded. How far they should be enforced, beyond the limits of the State which has enacted them must depend on several considerations, as whether any wrong or injury will be done to the citizens of the State in which they are sought to be enforced, whether its own laws will be contravened or impaired, and whether its courts are capable of doing complete justice to those liable to be affected by their decrees. New Haven Horse Shoe Nail Co. v. Linden Spring Co. 2 New Eng. Rep. 580, 142 Mass. 349.

Although in Aultman's Appeal, 98 Pa. 505, the courts of Pennsylvania apparently took full jurisdiction over an Ohio corporation and its stockholders, to enforce the liability of the stockholders under the Statutes of Ohio, yet the Massachusetts courts have uniformly declined such an exercise of jurisdictional power. See Erickson v. Nesmith, 15 Gray, 221; Halsey v. McLean, 12 Allen, 438; Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York, 14 Allen, 336; New Haven Horse Shoe Nail Co. v. Linden Spring Co. supra; Poet v. Toledo, C. & St. L. R. Co. 4 New Eng. Rep. 221, 144 Mass. 341.

A general statute imposing liability for corporate debts upon stockholders is not considered as imposing a penalty, but as recognizing an obligation arising upon contract. Norris v. Wrenschall, 24 Md. 422; Erickson v. Nesmith, 46 N. H. 371; Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 47; Coleman v. White, 14 Wis. 701.

When a statute confers a right and imposes a liability, without providing a distinct remedy the common law supplies an adequate remedy by giving to a party an appropriate action. But it is equally well settled that when a statute confers a right and prescribes a remedy, that remedy and that only can be pursued. Knowlton v. Aokley, 8 Cush. 97; Pollard v. Bailey, 37 U. S. 30 Wall. 527, 22 L. ed. 373; Jessup v. Carnegie, 80 N. Y. 441. 18 L. R. A.

and judgment has been rendered against it but no proceedings taken against him, cannot be maintained in a State where the corporation has no place of business when the parties, although both nonresidents, do not reside in the same State, and neither of them resides in the State where the corporation was organized.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as a stockholder of the Haddam State Bank, for unpaid and uncollectible debts of the Bank. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry S. Dewey, for plaintiff:

By the almost unanimous decisions of the courts of the several States, and of the federal courts, this action may be maintained.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 2d ed. § 223, and cases cited, especially Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371, 27 L. ed. 966; Cuykendall v. Miles, 10 Fed. Rep. 342; Andreus v. Bacon, 38 Fed. Rep. 777; Lowry v. Inman, 46 N. Y. 119; Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 47; Paine v.

When the liability contended for is in the nature of a penalty imposed by the statute of one State, it cannot be enforced in another. Halsey v. McLean, 12 Allen, 438; Bird v. Hayden, 1 Robt. 383; Derrickson v. Smith, 27 N. J. L. 166; Plymouth First Nat. Bank v. Price, 38 Md. 437; Gale v. Eastman, 7 Met. 14; State v. John, 5 Ohio, 217; Cable v. McCune, 26 Mo. 371; Lawler v. Burt, 7 Ohio St. 341; Dane v. Dane Mfg. Co. 14 Gray, 488; Merchants Bank v. Bliss, 1 Robt. 391.

One State will not enforce the penal laws of another.

Mr. Cook, in his late work on Stock and Stockholders, at § 213, says: "It is settled law that one State will not enforce the penal legislation of another State. Story, Conf. L. §§ 620-631; Wharton, Conf. L. § 853 et seq.; Rorer, Interstate Laws, 143, 149.

"Penal laws are strictly local, and cannot have any operation beyond the jurisdiction of the country where they were enacted." Sooville v. Canfield, 14 Johns. 338.

Consequently, it is a general rule that the courts of one State will enforce a statutory liability of stockholders created in another State, only when that liability is held to have arisen from contract. If it is penal, it can never be enforced out of the State by which it is created. Lowry v. Inman, 46 N. Y. 119; Patterson v. Baker, 34 How. Pr. 180; Union Iron Co. v. Pierce, 4 Biss. 327; Howell v. Mangelsdorf, 33 Kan. 194.

When the Statute of Limitations is relied upon as a defense, it becomes material to settle whether the liability is of a penal nature or whether it arises ex contractu. In the former case the statute is generally shorter. A statutory liability when it is a liability in contract and not a penalty may, under the proper limitations, be enforced in an action in the federal courts. Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371, 27 L. ed. 966.

And, in general, a creditor of a corporation whose shareholders are by statute made personally liable for its debts, may maintain a suit to enforce this liability wherever he can obtain jurisdiction over the necessary parties. The right to bring such an action, provided it does not seek to enforce a penalty, will not, it is believed, be denied in any State to the inhabitants of any other State, if there is jurisdiction of the proper parties defendant. Ault-

In proper cases, the courts of this Commonwealth are open to parties in controversies arising out of the statutory liability of stockholders in foreign corporations.

Post v. Toledo, C. & St. L. R. Co. 4 New Eng. Rep. 221, 144 Mass. 341.

Messrs. Hutchins & Wheeler, for defendant:

No proceeding at law or in equity will lie to enforce the individual liability for corporate debts imposed upon officers and stockholders by the laws of another State in which the corporation is established.

Smith v. Mut. L. Ins. Co. of New York, 14 Allen, 336, 342; Erickson v. Nesmith, 15 Gray, 221, 4 Allen, 238; Halsey v. McLean, 12 Allen, 488; *New Haven Horse Nail Co. v. In the enforcement of the Kansas law there will arise the question of the priorities of the claims of different creditors of the corporation.

In some States the creditor first bringing suit has priority.

Ingalls v. Cole, 47 Me. 530; Thebus v. Smiley, 110 Ill. 316.

In Missouri the creditors rank in the order in which they have respectively obtained judgment.

State Sav. Assn. v. Kellogg, 68 Mo. 540.

And it is generally held that a bill in equity will lie on behalf of all the creditors against the corporation and all the stockholders to secure a ratable division of the amounts due from the different stockholders among the creditors, and that in such a suit the creditors will be enjoined from prosecuting independent suits, and no priority among the creditors will be recognized.

Chicago v. Hall, 108 Ill. 342; Eames v. Dorris, 102 Ill. 350; Pfohl v. Simpson, 74 N. Y. 187; Wright v. McCormack, 17 Ohio St. 86. See Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, §§ 420-426; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 897.

If such a suit were pending in Kansas, and this defendant had been served with process therein, how could he protect himself from paying more than the statute liability? No injunction by the court in Kansas could affect the plaintiff, a resident of New York.

When Statute of Limitations applies.

Suits at law or in equity by creditors of a corporation to enforce the liability of stockholders under a state statute are governed by the Statute of Limitations of the State, and a liability, to be enforceable, must be in compliance with the condition applicable to it under the legislative Acts and judicial decisions of the State which creates the corporation and imposes the liability. *Andrews v. Comity as applied to the enforcement of a foreign law.

The laws of foreign States do not operate or have force in another State ex proprio vigore, but only ex comitate. The courts of a State where the laws of a foreign State are sought to be enforced will use a sound discretion as to the extent and mode of exercising this comity. They will not suffer foreign laws or statutes to work injury or injustice upon their own citizens, nor permit their tribunals to be used for the purpose of affording remedies which are denied to parties in the jurisdiction of the State that enacted the law, and which tend to operate with hardship on their own citizens and subjects. Erickson v. Nesmith, 15 Gray, 221.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a corporation of the State of New York. The defendant is a resident of California, who owned fifty shares of stock in the Haddam State Bank, a corporation of Kansas. The plaintiff recovered judgment in Kansas for $5,348 and costs against the Haddam State Bank, and took out execution thereon, but could find no property of the Bank whereon to levy, and so the execution was returned unsatisfied. No steps were taken in Kansas to charge the defendant as a stockholder in the Bank, but he being found in Massachusetts, the plaintiff brings this action against him here seeking to charge him personally for the judgment against the Bank to the amount of the par value of his shares therein, namely $5,000. This is sought to be done by virtue of the laws of Kansas, respecting which the averment in the declaration is as follows: "And the plaintiff further says, that by the laws of the State of Kansas if any execution shall have been issued against the property or effects of a corporation, except a railway or religious or charitable corporation, and there cannot be found any property whereon to levy such execution, then execution may be issued against any of the stockholders to an extent equal in amount to the amount of stock by him or her owned, together with any amount unpaid thereon; or the plaintiff in the execution may proceed by action to charge the stockholders with the amount of his judgment, and such plaintiff may maintain an action at law against any one or more of the stockholders of such corporation to recover a debt due by the corporation." The declaration was demurred to, and we have to determine whether the plaintiff states a case upon his declaration.

The declaration does not in terms set forth any statute of Kansas, nor show to what extent the laws of Kansas above set forth are statutory, or rest merely in judicial decisions. It is to be regretted that we are not at liberty to determine the case upon an examination of the Statute of Kansas, with the assistance of any construction which may have been put upon it by the courts of that State. But we must take the case as the parties present it to us.

The question can hardly be considered as an open one in this Commonwealth. This court has often declined to exercise jurisdiction to enforce a liability imposed upon stockholders in corporations established in other States under statutes of those States. In Post v. Toledo, C. & St. L. R. Co., 144 Mass. 341, 345, 4 New Eng. Rep. 221, it is said: "This court does not take jurisdiction of a suit to enforce this liability of stockholders in a foreign corporation, not because it would be a suit to enforce a penalty, or a suit opposed to the policy of our laws, but because it is a suit against a foreign corporation which involves the relation between it and its stockholders, and in which complete justice only can be done by the courts of the jurisdiction where the corporation was created." See also New Haven Horse Shoe Nail Co. v. Linden Spring Co. 142 Mass. 849, 358, 2 New Eng. Rep. 580, and cases cited.

The case at bar furnishes a strong illustration of the propriety of this course. If the plaintiff, as a creditor of the Kansas corporation, without obtaining any previous judgment in Kansas establishing the defendant's liability as a stockholder, can maintain an action directly and in the first instance against him in Massachusetts, for the purpose of charging him as a stockholder under the qualified liability set forth in the declaration, then it would follow that the plaintiff might also institute a similar action against him in California or in any number of other States where service upon him could be obtained. The plaintiff might also institute similar actions for the same debt in different States against other stockholders. In such case it is probable that a judgment against one stockholder without satisfaction would be no bar to actions against others; but it is obvious that the defendants in such actions might be put to great inconvenience in ascertaining, and indeed might find it practically impossible to ascertain, what steps the plaintiff might have taken against other stockholders in other States. A dishonest creditor might possibly recover several times over against different stockholders in different States, before they respectively could ascertain the facts. Likewise, the defendant, if compelled to pay under a judgment recovered in one State, would find it difficult if not impossible to enforce contribution from other stockholders residing elsewhere. Moreover, if the plaintiff might maintain such actions against the defendant and against other stockholders in different States, until he should finally recover satisfaction, other creditors of the Kansas corporation might also do the same. If every creditor of a Kansas corporation which has no property with which to respond to a judgment obtained by such creditor against it in Kansas, may therefore, without any further proceedings in that State to charge the stockholders, maintain an action against every stockholder in every State of the Union where service can be obtained, and pursue such action until satisfaction is obtained from some stockholder in some State, it is obvious that a large amount of litigation might ensue, under which substantial justice as among the stockholders could not be worked out. The liability of the stockholder, as set forth in the declaration, is not a general liability for all the debts of the corporation. The execution against the stockholder which can be issued in Kansas in the action against the corporation, as set forth in the declaration, is only "to an extent equal in amount to the amount of stock by him or her owned, together with any amount unpaid thereon." Probably by the true construction of the Statute the action at law to charge stockholders, which is given as an alternative remedy, would be limited to a like amount as the execution; though according to the averment of the declaration the plaintiff in the execution may proceed by action to charge the stockholders with the amount of his judgment, without any other limitation being expressed. The present plaintiff does not contend that it can recover against the defendant the full amount of its judgment, but only the par value of the defendant's stock in the Bank. The liability sought to be enforced is a strictly limited one. It seems to us that a bona fide, or at any rate a compulsory, payment to one creditor would discharge a stockholder to that extent from liability to others; and a payment of the full par value of his stock would, according to the view which has been expressed by this court, be a full discharge (Halsey v. McLean, 12 Allen, 442), though as to this other courts might hold otherwise. Fowler v. Robinson, 31 Me. 189; Grose v. Hill, 36 Me. 22.

There is no averment in the declaration that the defendant has not thus been discharged from liability, and perhaps this is not necessary, as it would be more properly a matter of defense. But in case of several actions in different States, questions of priority of the claims of creditors might arise, upon which the decisions of the courts of the different States might not be uniform, and thus the defendant might be held liable more than once, and even a compulsory payment might not avail to protect him, as is shown by the cases cited by the defendant. Moreover, the defendant might by way of set-off present claims which he holds either against the corporation in Kansas, or against the creditor who sues him, and different decisions in respect to his right of set-off might be made in different States.

These considerations are suggested to illustrate the practical difficulty of enforcing a liability such as that set forth in the declaration, in other States than that where the corporation is established, in such a way as to secure substantial justice. This difficulty is far greater in cases where no steps have been taken in the State where the corporation is established, to ascertain and determine the amount of each stockholder's liability. There the whole amount of debts can be ascertained, and the proper proportion assessed upon each stockholder; or his liability can be otherwise determined, in a manner which will avoid many of the objections which exist against the maintenance of actions like the present. We remain satisfied with the conclusions heretofore reached by this court, that such an action under the circumstances which appear here, ought not to be entertained in this State. Limiting our decision to the facts now before us, it is this: that a resident of the State of New York cannot maintain in the courts of this State an action against a resident of the State of California, to establish his personal liability as a stockholder of a corporation organized in the State of Kansas, and having no place of business in this State, for a debt of that corporation to the plaintiff under laws of Kansas, such as are set forth in the declaration, providing for a certain special and limited liability on the part of stockholders, when no judicial proceedings have been taken in Kansas to ascertain and establish the liability of the defendant as such stockholder.

Whether the same result might not be reached on the ground that the subsidiary liability of stockholders such as is set forth, is matter of remedy only, and does not follow the stockholder outside the State, there being no averment of a different construction of the statute by the Kansas courts, we need not consider. Brown v. Eastern Slate Co. 134 Mass. 590.

1. The malicious prosecution of a civil suit without probable cause is actionable, although defendant is not arrested or his property attached.

2. The voluntary dismissal of a civil suit is not as matter of law prima facie evidence of malice in its institution.

3. The doctrine of reasonable doubt as to guilt of the alleged crime has no application in an action for malicious prosecution of a suit

NOTE.—General rules relating to malicious prosecution.

Probable cause which will justify a criminal accusation, is defined to be a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in his belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense with which he is charged. Munns v. Dupont, 3 Wash. C. C. 37; Foshay v. Ferguson, 2 Denio, 617; Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 218.

Adjudged cases are found, decided by the American courts, which seem to follow the English rule, and deny the right of action based upon a civil action, which has been maliciously prosecuted without the instance of either arrest or attachment; but recent authorities announce the more reasonable rule and decide that such an action is maintainable. McCardle v. McGinley, 36 Ind. 538, 44 Am. Rep. 343; Whipple v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 582; Closson v. Staples, 42 Vt. 209; Eastin v. Bank of Stockton, 66 Cal. 123, 56 Am. Rep. 77; Vanduzor v. Linderman, 10 Johns. 108; Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345; Cox v. Taylor, 10 B. Mon. 17; Woods v. Finnell, 13 Bush, 623; Marbourg v. Smith, 11 Kan. 554; Payne v. Don-18 L. R. A.

egan, 9 Ill. App. 566; Johnson v. Meyer, 36 La. Ann. 383; Hoyt v. Macon, 2 Colo. 113; Hall v. Leaming, 31 N. J. L. 321, 36 Am. Dec. 213.

Where an action has been commenced maliciously without probable cause, and the defendant has been arrested at the instance of the plaintiff, or his property attached, or he has been injured in any special manner, such proceedings, although in the nature of a civil suit, are sufficient to base an action for malicious prosecution. Mayer v. Walter, 64 Pa. 238; Sledge v. McLaren, 29 Ga. 64; Bump v. Betts, 19 Wend. 421; Watkins v. Baird, 6 Mass. 506; Lawrence v. Hagerman, 56 Ill. 68; Stewart v. Cole, 46 Ala. 646; Henderson v. Jackson, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 236; Cox v. Taylor, 10 B. Mon. 17; Savage v. Brewer, 16 Pick. 453; Farley v. Danks, 4 El. & Bl. 493; Austin v. Debnam, 3 Barn. & C. 139; Hayden v. Shed, 11 Mass. 500; Spengler v. Davy, 15 Gratt. 381; Closson v. Staples, 42 Vt. 209.

The onus is upon the plaintiff to prove both the want of probable cause for the prosecution instituted against him, and malice on the part of the defendant. If he failed to prove either of these facts, the action necessarily abates. Besson v.

for slanderous words charging a crime. A preponderance of evidence is sufficient to make out a case for either party.

4. False statements concerning a candidate for office are not included within the privilege of discussing his character and fitness.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged malicious prosecution of a civil action brought by defendant against plaintiff. Reversed.

Statement by Sherwood, Ch. J.:

Action for malicious prosecution. Burrus brought suit against Smith for slander, alleging that the latter had charged him with stealing horses; but, after Smith had been thus put to the trouble and expense of employing counsel to defend the suit, Burrus, as he admitted in his answer, voluntarily dismissed the suit he had brought, and when on the witness stand testified: "I dismissed the suit voluntarily, because I wanted to." It appeared in evidence on the trial that, at the time the charges were made by Smith, Burrus was running for justice of the county court in the Eastern District of Scotland County; and the charges were made by Smith, who himself lived in that district, to other voters; and that affidavits were read by others implicating Burrus as an accomplice with one Mayfield in larcenous operations in regard to horses. Mayfield, shortly before the election came off, was convicted and sentenced for five years to the penitentiary. There was testimony adduced at the trial which certainly had a strong tendency to show that the charges made by Smith were not unfounded, and there was some testimony of a contrary effect. The instructions, so far as necessary, will be quoted and noticed in the opinion. The jury found for the defendant, hence this appeal.

Messrs. S. W. Birch and Harrison & Mahan, for appellant:

The voluntary discontinuance of his suit against plaintiff Smith is prima facie evidence of the malice of defendant Burrus.

Burhans v. Sanford, 19 Wend. 417, and cases cited; Garrison v. Pearce, 3 E. D. Smith, 255.

Plaintiff Smith had the right to discuss the honesty and integrity of Burrus with the voters of the Eastern District of Scotland County, and to give them such information as he possessed as to his qualities and his fitness for the office of county judge. By offering himself as a candidate a man offers his character for discussion and investigation; he should be held and considered as putting his character in issue so far as respects his qualifications for the office.

Proof of malice will not excuse or supply the want of proof of want of probable cause, neither can the want of probable cause be inferred from proof of malice, although malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause. Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 498, 544; Wheeler v. Neebitt, 65 U. S. 24 How. 544, 16 L. ed. 765; Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19; Cook v. Walker, 30 Ga. 519; Dickinson v. Maynard, 20 La. Ann. 66; *Ganea v. Action lies in cases of arrest.

Thus an action will lie where a civil suit is maliciously and without probable cause begun by the arrest of the party defendant (Collins v. Hayte, 50 Ill. 397, 99 Am. Dec. 521; Burhans v. Sanford, 19 Wend. 417; Watkins v. Baird, 6 Mass. 506, 4 Am. Dec. 170; Plummer v. Dennett, 6 Me. 421, 20 Am. Dec. 816; Turner v. Walker, 3 Gill & J. 377, 22 Am. Dec. 329); for maliciously and without cause instituting proceedings in bankruptcy against another (Chapman v. Pickersgill, 2 Wils. 145; Johnson v. Emerson, 25 L. T. N. S. 387; Whitworth v. Hall, 2 Barn. & Ad. 695; Farley v. Danka, 4 El. & Bl. 496; Brown v. Chapman, 8 Burr. 1418); for maliciously attaching the party's property. Preston v. Cooper, 1 Dill. 589; Williams v. Hunter, 3 Hawks, 545, 14 Am. Dec. 597; Wood v. Weir, 5 B. Mon. 544; McCullough v. Grishobber, 4 Watts & S. 201; Waiser v. Thies, 56 Mo. 86; Fullenwider v. Danielson, 32 Ill. 545; Shaver v. White, 6 Munf. 110, 8 Am. Dec. 780.

grounds untrue in fact, actual damages may be recovered, though there was probable cause. Carothers v. McIlhenny Co. 63 Tex. 139; Bear v. Marx, 63 Tex. 298.

And giving a bond of indemnity as required by statute does not defeat the action. Lawrence v. Hagerman, 56 Ill. 68, 8 Am. Rep. 874.

The defendant cannot justify or mitigate the wrongful attachment of goods by showing that he offered to return the property on the next day in the same condition. Carpenter v. Dresser, 72 Me. 377, 39 Am. Rep. 337.

And it is no defense that defendant, before taking out the attachment, heard that some other creditor was going to attach (Carothers v. McIlhenny Co. supra), even though there was an indebtedness and ground for a suit. Tomlinson v. Warner, 9 Ohio, 103; Spaids v. Barrett, 57 Ill. 289, 11 Am. Rep. 10; Savage v. Brewer, 16 Pick. 453, 28 Am. Dec. 255; Fortman v. Rottler, 8 Ohio St. 548, 72 Am. Dec. 606; Herman v. Brookerhoff, 8 Watts, 240.

The question of probable cause, when there is no conflict in the evidence, no disputed facts nor any doubt upon the evidence, or the inferences drawn from it, is one of law for the court and not of fact for the jury. It is said in Besson v. Southard, 10 N. Y. 236, that if the facts which are adduced as proof of want of probable cause are controverted, if conflicting testimony is to be weighed, or if the credibility of witnesses is to be passed upon, the question of probable cause should go to the jury with proper instructions as to the law. In such cases it is a mixed question of law and fact. The rule laid down in Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 424, is expressly approved by Jewett, J., in that case. Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19.

For further discussion of this subject, see notes to Antiloff v. June (Mich.), 10 L. R. A. 621, and Pope v. Pollock (Ohio) 4 L. R. A. 255.

The language or communication used by plaintiff Smith is privileged. "It was upon a proper occasion, from a proper motive, and made in good faith upon reasonable and probable cause."

Briggs v. Garrett, 2 Cent. Rep. 364, 111 Pa. 404, 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 498, and note; Express Printing Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 354, 24 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 640, and note; Mott v. Dawson, 46 Iowa, 533; Crane v. Waters, 10 Fed. Rep. 619; Newell, Defamation, Slander and Libel, § 138, p. 535.

Smith's communication was only to the voters, and only for the purpose of giving in good faith what plaintiff believed to be truthful information, and only for the purpose of enabling such voters to cast ballots more intelligently. It clearly is a privileged communication.

State v. Balch, supra; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 160; White v. Nicholls, 44 U. S. 3 How. 266, 11 L. ed. 591; Brow v. Hathaway, 95 Mass. 239; Klinck v. Colby, 46 N. Y. 427; note to Munster v. Lamb, 23 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 22; L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 588; Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211; Mott v. Dawson, supra; Bays v. Hunt, 60 Iowa, 251.

The court erred in giving the instructions which require the jury to find "beyond a reasonable doubt," and that the "same evidence must be adduced by plaintiff as would be necessary to convict the defendant upon an indictment for horse stealing." This issue should be decided as in other civil cases, according to a preponderance of the evidence, and the reasonable probability of its truth.

Marshall v. Thames Fire Ins. Co. 43 Mo. 586; Bohachild v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 63 Mo. 356; Edwards v. Knapp, 97 Mo. 432.

Mearns. R. D. Cramer, John C. Moore and McKee & Jayne for respondent.

Sherwood, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. At the outset of the examination of the case at bar we are met by the preliminary question whether the facts stated in the petition constitute a cause of action. This point under our Code of Civil Procedure is always open to examination even in an appellate court, and, like the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter of the action, is never waived, and may be taken advantage of for the first time on appeal. Rev. Stat. § 2047; Sweet v. Maupin, 65 Mo. loc. cit. 72; McIntire v. McIntire, 80 Mo. loc. cit. 478; Walker v. Bradbury, 57 Mo. 66.

The authorities are in conflict as to whether a petition states a cause of action, which merely alleges that a civil action, brought and prosecuted maliciously and without probable cause, has been terminated in favor of the defendant; many of the authorities maintaining that no cause of action exists unless such civil process be accompanied by arrest of the person or seizure of the property, and that the plaintiff in such original action, in contemplation of law, is sufficiently punished by the payment of costs. This view has received the sanction of Judge Cooley, Torts, 2d ed., 217 et seq., and cases cited.

But there are numerous and able decisions 13 L. R. A.

in opposition to this view, and it is difficult to combat the force of the reasoning they employ. It is difficult to see why the right of a plaintiff, who, as defendant, has been sued in a civil action maliciously and without probable cause, and who has been put to great expense in consequence thereof, should be altered or at all affected merely by the incident of his property having been attached or his person seized; for, in either case, the damage, the expense, and costs of defending a suit, whether instituted by ca. sa. or attachment, or by civil summons, would be the same, and it is clear that the recovery of costs would not, under our practice, reimburse him for his attorney's fees, something which and other incidental expenses he does recover under the English practice. The cases on both sides of this subject have been extensively collated and exhaustively reviewed by John D. Lawson, in 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 281, 353, and the conclusion reached that the better doctrine is that which allows an action to be maintained as well where property etc., has not been seized as where it has. The authorities also are well reviewed in 14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title Malicious Prosecutions, p. 32 et seq., and notes. Besides, this court in Brady v. Errin, 48 Mo. 533, adopted the view that an action for malicious prosecution may be maintained where the original action was begun by civil summons alone.

2. Of its own motion the court gave instruction No. 1: "The court, on plaintiff's behalf, of its own motion, instructs the jury that if they find from the evidence that in the defendant's suit against the plaintiff this defendant's charge of slander was false, and that said suit was instituted with malice, and that said suit was also instituted without probable cause, and that this plaintiff was damaged thereby, the jury will find for the plaintiff in an amount not exceeding the amount claimed in this plaintiff's petition. If the jury find that this defendant's charge of slander was false, then the proof of want of probable cause, being the proof of a negative, may be made out by slight evidence, but malice is not to be necessarily inferred from the want of probable cause. Malice is the intentional doing of a wrongful act without just cause or excuse [and the jury are instructed that, under the pleadings in this case, it is admitted that defendant, Burrus, voluntarily instituted and voluntarily dismissed said slander suit of Burrus v. Smith, and the court further instructs the jury that such voluntary dismissal of said slander suit is in this cause prima facie evidence of malice on the part of defendant, Burrus.] Attention will now be directed to that portion of that instruction which is inclosed in brackets. Instruction No. 1, asked by the plaintiff, but refused him, is to the same effect, and as to that portion of the instruction, of course, the plaintiff would have no right to complain. We do not regard either instruction as asserting the law on this point. In the Law of Torts (2d ed. pp. 214, 215), it is said by Judge Cooley: "The burden of proving that the prosecution was malicious is also upon the plaintiff. If a want of probable cause is shown, malice may be inferred; but the deduction is not a necessary one, and the mere discontinuance of a criminal prosecution, or the acquittal of the accused, will establish for the purposes of this suit neither malice nor want of probable cause. But, if an arrest is made in a civil suit which is afterwards voluntarily discontinued, the discontinuance has been held to furnish prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause."

If the discontinuance of a criminal prosecution, instituted by the defendant, and discontinued at his instance, be evidence which establishes neither malice nor want of probable cause, it is difficult to see how the voluntary discontinuance of a civil action instituted by the defendant can cut a wider swath. "Prima facie evidence of a fact," says Mr. Justice Story, "is such evidence as, in judgment of law, is sufficient to establish the fact, and, if not rebutted, remains sufficient for the purpose." Lilienthal's Tobacco v. United States, 97 U. S. loc. cit. 268, 24 L. ed. 905, and cases cited. The portion of the instruction heretofore referred to, therefore, in effect told the jury that the voluntary dismissal of the civil action begun by defendant made out a case for the plaintiff, without more; but this was not the law. The instructions, therefore, referred to, were tantamount to saying that the mere discontinuance of the action for slander was sufficient, in and of itself, to make out a case of malice on his part; but, as already seen, this is not the law. As Judge Cooley says, the deduction of malice from a want of probable cause is not a necessary one. Of course, malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause, and from the voluntary dismissal of the original civil action; but such inference is one of fact, and one for the jury, under appropriate instructions, to draw.

8. In regard to the words used by plaintiff which gave origin to the suit for slander, the court instructed the jury: "And, to warrant the jury in finding that the said alleged language was true, the same evidence must be adduced by plaintiff as would be necessary to convict the defendant upon an indictment for horse stealing, and if the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiff uttered the said words of and concerning defendant, and entertain a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt of the crime imputed to him in said words, the jury should find a verdict for defendant. By a 'reasonable doubt' it meant a substantial doubt, based on and arising from the evidence, and not a mere possibility of defendant's innocence." This view of the law, though sustained by the case of Polston v. See, 54 Mo. 291, by a divided court, was unanimously overthrown in the case of Edwards v. Knapp, 97 Mo. 432; and the now generally prevalent modern doctrine established that, in all civil actions, a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to make out a case for either litigant. Besides, in actions of this sort, such an instruction is wholly out of place. Whether a party is suing or sued for malicious prosecution, the absolute guilt of the particular individual is not at all a controlling issue. Absence of malice and probable cause are the governing factors, and constituent elements of the forensic contest.

4. The remaining point to be discussed is whether the court should have given instruction No. 4, asked by plaintiff, but refused by the court, which was the following: "If the jury believe from the evidence that defendant Burrus was a candidate for the public office of county judge in and for the Eastern District of Scotland County, Mo., at the general election of the year 1884; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the character, honesty and fitness of said Burrus to fill such public office was relevant to the candidacy of said Burrus, and necessary to be known by the voters and constituents of said Burrus at said general election, for their own interest and protection; and if the jury further find from the evidence that the language shown by the testimony in this case to have been used by Smith about Burrus was so used by said Smith to some of the voters and constituents of said Burrus at said general election, and to none other, in a private oral discussion of the character and honesty and fitness of said Burrus to fill such public office; and that said language was so used in good faith, for the purpose of giving such voters and constituents relevant and proper information for their own interest and protection; and that said language was so used by said Smith in said Eastern District of Scotland County, after said Burrus had been nominated for said public office, and before said general election in said eastern district; and that said Smith was a voter at said general election in said eastern district,—then the court instructs the jury that such language so used by said Smith is privileged; that said Smith had the right to so use the same; and that defendant, Burrus, did not have reasonable and probable cause for bringing said suit for slander against plaintiff, Smith."

There is a conflict of authority on the question whether such an instruction should be given in instances like the present; but, as this case is one of first impression in this State, we are free to adopt that rule which we regard as best comporting with the proper preservation of the rights of individuals, good government, social order, justice and sound reason. The correct rule, we take it, is that expressed by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Com. v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, where Chief Justice Parsons, speaking for the court, said: "When any man shall consent to be a candidate for a public office conferred by the election of the people, he must be considered as putting his character in issue, so far as it may respect his fitness and qualifications for the office: and publications of the truth on this subject, with the honest intention of informing the people, are not a libel; for it would be unreasonable to conclude that the publication of truths which it is the interest of the people to know should be an offense against the law. For the same reason the publication of falsehood and calumny against public officers or candidates for public offices is an offense most dangerous to the people, and deserves punishment, because the people may be deceived, and reject the best citizens, to their great injury, and it may be to the loss of their liberties." This expression of the law was cited approvingly in Wheaton v. Beecher, 66 Mich. 307, 9 West. Rep. 890, an action for libel, with plea of privileged communication regarding a candidate for a public office; and Sherwood, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The libel in this case was not privileged. It is true the plaintiff was a candidate for appointment to the office of comptroller of the City of Detroit, but this did not license the defendant, or any other person, to villify, falsify and calumniate the character of the plaintiff for honesty, integrity and morality. There is no doubt that when a man in this country becomes a candidate for an office, elective or appointive, his character for honesty and integrity, and his qualifications and fitness for the position, are put before the people, and are thereby made proper subjects for comment, and that publications of the truth in regard to the candidate are not libelous; and it is equally true that the publication of falsehood against such candidate is wrong, and deserves to be punished." Bronson v. Bruce, 59 Mich. 467, was also an action for libel on a candidate for a public office, and the claim of privilege was also interposed; but Chaplin, J., as the organ of the court, said: "The electors of a congressional district are interested in knowing the truth, not falsehoods, concerning the qualifications and character of one who offers to represent them in Congress; and it is the right and privilege of any elector, or person also having an interest to be represented, to freely criticise the act and conduct of such candidate, and show, if he can, why such person is unfit to be intrusted with the office, or why the suffrages of the electors should not be cast by him. But defamation is not a necessary and indispensable concomitant of an election contest." "To hold that false charges of a defamatory character, made against a candidate, are privileged as matters of law, if made in good faith, and that the party making them is absolutely shielded against liability, it seems to me is a most pernicious doctrine. It would deter all sensitive and honorable men from accepting the candidacy to office, and leave the field to the profligate, the unprincipled and unworthy; to men who have no character to lose, no reputation to blemish. It could scarcely be expected that any man, worthy of the position, would consent to stand for an office, and have his reputation tarnished, his good name scandalized, in the face of the whole community, if such doctrine as this is to prevail. Besides, under the guise of assisting the people to select a fit man, the voters are deceived by falsehood, and induced to withhold their support from the maligned candidate, and so two wrongs are perpetrated,—one upon the candidate, the other in misleading the voter." At an early day in Tennessee the same question arose, and a similar ruling was made; Overton, J., remarking: "Slander is no more justifiable when spoken of a man with a view to his election than on any other occasion. Unhappy, indeed, would be any people when, in 18 L. R. A.

the exercise of one right, you destroy as important a one. Let his talents, his virtues, and such vices as are likely to affect his public character be freely discussed but no falsehoods be propagated." Brewer v. Weakley, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 99. The same view of the law prevails in West Virginia, where Green, P., delivering the opinion of the court, said, in speaking of the degree of freedom with which the character of a candidate for public office may be treated, said: "As this right of criticism is confined to the acts or conduct of such candidate, whenever the facts which constitute the act or conduct criticised are not admitted, they must, of course, be proven. . . . His talents and qualifications, mentally and physically, for the office he asks at the hands of the people, may freely be commented on in publications in a newspaper, and, though such comments be harsh and unjust, no malice will be implied, for these are matters of opinion, of which the voters are the only judges; but no one has a right by a publication to impute to such candidate, falsely, crimes, or publish allegations affecting his character falsely." Sweeney v. Baker, 18 W. Va. 183. The same rule prevails as to the conduct of a public officer as that relating to a candidate for office, as the authorities show; and in regard to what are privileged communications respecting the former class, Folger, Ch. J., said: "We are of the opinion that the official act of a public functionary may be freely criticised, and entire freedom of expression used in argument, sarcasm, and ridicule upon the act itself; and that then the occasion will excuse everything but actual malice and evil purpose in the critic. We are of the opinion that the occasion will not of itself excuse an aspersive attack upon the character and motives of the officer, and that, to be excused, the critic must show the truth of what he has uttered of that kind." Hamilton v. Eno, 81 N. Y. 126. The doctrine here asserted is also prevalent in Illinois. In Rearick v. Wilcox, 81 Ill. 77, Craig, J., said: "While the qualifications and fitness of a candidate for office might properly be discussed with freedom by the press of the country, we are aware of no case that goes so far as to hold that the private character of a person who is a candidate for office can be destroyed by the publication of a libelous article in a newspaper notwithstanding the election may be attended with that excitement and feeling that not unfrequently enters into our elections. . . . The law required appellee, as the publisher of a journal, to publish facts, and not libelous articles. The character and reputation of appellant was as sacred, and as much entitled to protection, when a candidate for office, as at any other time." The same doctrine is announced in other States, and we regard it as the better one, especially in this day and age, when in heated political campaigns the "rattling tongue of noisy and audacious" slander, and what Lord Mansfield, in Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2562, calls "that mendax infamia from the press," sorely need to have placed upon them some fetter, some check, some curb which shall be able, in some degree at least, to restrain them within something like legitimate boundaries, and something like a decent regard for private character. Within these bounds of legitimate discussion all that is necessary to say and proper to say respecting the actions and qualifications of candidates or public officers may legitimately be said, without descending into the sinks and cess-pools of vituperation.

For the errors aforesaid the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

v.
Edward G. WOODHOUSE.

Julia H. ROBERTSON et al., Appts.,

v.
SAME.

(59 Conn. 568.)

1. No delivery of a deed, either absolute or conditional, can be made without parting at the time with the possession of it, and with all power and control over it by the grantor for the benefit of the grantees.

2. Warranty deeds made by way of gift, which are in a box with money and bank books, are not delivered by the grantor, when expecting to die, by giving the box to another person saying that "the names of the persons who are going to have the houses are on the deeds, and if I live I will talk further about the contents of the box; but don't you open it until after my funeral."

(December 15, 1890.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of defendants in actions brought to compel defendant to deliver to complainants two deeds to real estate, left for delivery after her death by the grantor, Julia A. Hinman, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles E. Perkins, Horace Cornwall and Samuel F. Jones, for appellants:

There is no specific form of words required in such cases to vest the title. The rule of law is, that it must appear from the acts and words of the grantor that she intended that the grantees should have the deeds after the death of the grantor. It is not even necessary that the deeds should be actually delivered to the grantees or to anyone for them; it is enough if they are so placed that they, or some other person for them, can get the deeds after the death of the grantor.

Less evidence is required in cases of gift, and where no rights of creditors or others are affected.

In some cases it has been held that the delivery of the deed must be such as to place it beyond the control or power of the grantor to retake it if he so desired, but such is not the rule in this State.

NOTE.—Gifts causa mortis and inter vivos.

A gift of a savings bank book from husband to wife causa mortis is not valid without delivery; although in her possession, that is not sufficient to pass the property. See Drew v. Hagerty (Me.) 3 L. R. A. 230.

A gift by an aunt, to her nephew, of certain money which was shortly before and perhaps at the time in possession of the donee, as her agent, is a valid and complete gift inter vivos. See Miller v. McMechen (W. Va.) 6 L. R. A. 515, and note.

Where one confined to his bed by a fatal sickness instructs another to whom he has intrusted keys of a private box in a bank vault to extract certain money therefrom and label it separately as the property of a third person and deliver it to him, it is a valid gift causa mortis. Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two cases tried together and depending on the same facts. The defendant is the executor of the will of Mrs. Julia Hinman, late of Hartford, deceased. The complaint prays that two deeds now in the possession of the defendant be delivered, one to the said Nora J. Porter, and the other to the said Julia Robertson. The only question in the case is, whether on the facts found these deeds were so delivered as to pass the title. The facts are as follows:

Mrs. Julia Hinman, in her lifetime, and until her death, owned two houses in Hartford, in one of which she lived. She died on the 10th day of June, 1888, aged eighty-two years. Several years before her death she made a deed of one of these houses to Mrs. Porter, and at another time a deed of the other house to Mrs. Robertson. They were warranty deeds in form and were expressed to be for a valuable consideration. They were signed, sealed, witnessed and acknowledged. All the requisites of a formal execution were complete and each was filed on the back with the name of the grantee. Nothing was paid for them; they were in fact deeds of gift. The grantees never knew until after the death of Mrs. Hinman that they had been made. These deeds were placed by Mrs. Hinman in a box in which she kept her will, her bank books, her policies of insurance, and other papers of like kind, and in which she had also a bag containing $1,000 in gold. The box was concealed in a closet in her bedroom. During the last year of her life a Mrs. Harriet Elliot lived with her and was her only companion and attendant. Previous to the 10th day of April, 1888, Mrs. Hinman had told Mrs. Elliot that she had deeded away the two houses, but had refused to tell her to whom. On that day Mrs. Hinman fell, and was so severely injured that she feared she was going to die. On the morning of the 11th she told Mrs. Elliot where the box was, and requested her to bring it out. Mrs. Elliot did so and placed it on the bed. Mrs. Hinman then said to Mrs. Elliot, "Take that box into your lap. I put it into your possession. My private papers are in that box and a bag of gold containing $1,000. My will is in there and the deeds of these two houses. I told you before that I have deeded away these houses; on the deeds are the names of the persons who are going to have the houses." She then told Mrs. Elliot to take charge of the box and put it back into the closet, and told her where the key to the box was; and that if she did not live she wished her (Mrs. Elliot) to speak to E. G. Woodhouse, the defendant, and request him to read her will after the funeral. Then, after some further directions about the box, she closed the conversation by saying: "I have said enough, so that you will know what to do with the box in case I should die. If I live I will talk further about the contents of the box. But don't you open it until after my funeral." After this conversation, Mrs. Elliot took charge of the box, but so far as appears never opened it until the day of Mrs. Hinman's funeral. In conversations subsequent to this one, Mrs. Hinman spoke about the bag of gold in the box, and of the provisions of her will, but never spoke about the deeds. Mrs. Hinman died about midnight of June 10, 1888. From the morning of the preceding day to the time of her death she was in a dying state and in a deep stupor, during which she observed nothing and said nothing, except that at about nine o'clock in the forenoon she suddenly exclaimed, "Call Robinson! Call Robinson! there are those two deeds, one is for Julia Robertson, and one is for Nora Porter." No Robinson was there at the time and no one of that name had been in attendance upon her. Mrs. Elliot and a nurse, Mrs. Wright, were there, but Mrs. Hinman was not conscious of their presence or of what she was saying.

The delivery of a deed implies a parting with the possession and a surrender of authority over it by the grantor at the time, either absolutely or conditionally; absolutely, if the effect of the deed is to be immediate and the title to pass or the estate of the grantee to commence at once; but conditionally, if the operation of the deed is to be postponed or made dependent on the happening of some subsequent event. A conditional delivery is and can only be made by placing the deed in the hands of a third person to be kept by him until the happening of the event of which the deed is to be delivered over by the third person to the grantee. But it is an essential characteristic and an indispensable feature of every delivery, whether absolute or conditional, that there must be a parting with the possession of the deed and with all power and control over it by the grantor for the benefit of the grantee at the time of the delivery. Prutman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644. The delivery of a deed is as essential to the passing of the title to the land described in it as is the signing of it or the acknowledgment. It is the final act without which all other formalities are ineffectual. To constitute a delivery, the grantor must part with the legal possession of the deed and of all right to retain it. The present and future dominion over the deed must pass from the grantor. And all this must happen in the grantor's lifetime. Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 686, 18 L. ed. 268; Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 476; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 421; Jackson v. Leek, 12 Wend. 105; Fay v. Richardson, 7 Pick. 91; Alsop v. Swothel, 7 Conn. 508; Hoboken City Bank v. Phelps, 34 Conn. 103; 2 Kent, Com. 439; Bouvier, Law Dict. Delivery.

Upon the facts above recited, the superior court rendered judgment for the defendant and dismissed the complaint. We think that judgment was clearly right, for the reason that Mrs. Hinman never intended to and never did part with the legal control over the deeds. The box in which the deeds were was in the charge of Mrs. Elliot, as the servant and agent of Mrs. Hinman, and so remained until after Mrs. Hinman's death. The deeds were never taken out of the box till after her funeral. Mrs. Elliot never knew till that time the names of the grantees. She had never received any directions as to the deeds of such, apart from the other contents of the box. It is not and cannot be claimed that Mrs. Hinman parted with the possession of the box itself, or the control over the bag of gold, or of her bank books, or of her will, or of her insurance policies. Yet these were in the box with the deeds, and she parted with the possession and control of these just as much as she did with the deeds. The deeds were never separated from the other contents of the box. The conversation, on the morning of April 11, clearly shows that Mrs. Hinman did not intend at that time to part with the control of the contents of the box. She intended to give further directions in regard to them. Her closing words were, "If I live I will talk further with you about the contents of the box." That further talk she never had, and so her intent as to the deeds remained undisclosed. Mrs. Elliot was never made the custodian of the deeds for the benefit of the grantees. She at all times held them in the same way that she held the other things in the box, as the agent of Mrs. Hinman.

In reference to the conversation just mentioned, the superior court has found that Mrs. Hinman's sole purpose in the transaction was to give Mrs. Elliot information of the existence and contents of the box. It is claimed by the defendant that by such finding the superior court has left nothing for the examination of this court, for the reason that it excludes all intent on the part of Mrs. Hinman to transfer the title to the grantees named in the deeds. This may be true, but we do not place our decision upon it. The delivery of a deed includes not only an act by which the grantor parts with the possession of it, but also a concurring intent on the part of the grantor that it shall vest the title in the grantee. As we are satisfied that Mrs. Hinman never did any act by which she parted with the possession of the deeds for the benefit of the grantees, the question of her intent becomes immaterial.

There is no error in the judgment of the Superior Court.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

Re John M. CLAYTON.

(59 Conn. 510.)

1. Requiring a person convicted of intoxication to make a disclosure under

NOTE.—Refusal to testify, or to answer particular questions.

It may safely be laid down, as a general rule, that the refusal of a witness to testify at all, or to answer particular questions, pertinent to the issue, put to him either in a proceeding before the court itself or before a subordinate officer duly empowered by the court to take his deposition or conduct his examination, is a contempt of such court, provided always the court have jurisdiction of the controversy or proceeding in which the witness is required to give his evidence. Re Allen, 18 Blatchf. 271; Whitcomb's Case, 120 Mass. 118, 121; La Fontaine v. Southern Underwriters Asso. 88 N. C. 122; Stuart v. Allen, 45 Wis. 158, 161; Rex v. Almon, Wilms. 243, 269; Ex parte Doll, 7 Phila. 556. See Rapalje, Contempts, § 66.

The right of a witness to answer is a personal privilege; his right to exercise it rests in his own discretion; he uses it at his peril. Heerd v. Wetmore, 2 Robt. 697; Southard v. Rexford, 6 Cow. 255; People v. Bodine, 1 Denio, 281; People v. Lohman, 2 Barb. 216.

The supreme court of New York has held that a 18 L.R. A.

oath, when, where, how and from whom he procured the intoxicating liquor, does not violate the constitutional provisions as to due process of law, equal protection, or right of trial by jury; nor is it against public policy.

2. Commitment for contempt in refusing to make a disclosure as required by law is not a deprivation of liberty without due process of law.

3. The utility of a disclosure required by statute from one convicted of intoxication, as to when, where, how and from whom he obtained the intoxicating liquor, which disclosure is to be turned over to the State's attorney, cannot be questioned by the convict or the court as an excuse for a refusal to make the disclosure.

(December 15, 1890.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County refusing to release him from imprisonment in the Hartford jail, to which he had been committed for contempt of court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George P. McLean and Austin Brainard, for appellant:

If the law is unconstitutional, all proceedings under it are void, and Clayton was unlawfully committed.

Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 871, 25 L. ed. 717; Herrick v. Smith, 1 Gray, 49; Riley's Case, 2 Pick. 172; Re Payson, 28 Kan. 757.

If the law is, in its operation, unreasonable and unjust, it is the duty of the court to declare it void.

Goshen v. Stonington, 4 Conn. 225; Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 155; State v. Wordin, 6 New Eng. Rep. 752, 56 Conn. 226.

This Statute is void: (1) in that it deprives the person committed of the right to trial by jury, as guaranteed by section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of Connecticut; (2) it deprives the person committed of his liberty without due course of law.

The liberty of the person in custody is at once placed at the discretion or caprice of the presiding judge. The judge determines the truth or falsity of the disclosure offered, the validity and good faith of the reasons assigned for making no disclosure, pure questions of fact, involving in their determination the lib-witness was not compelled to answer any question, the truthful answer to which would have a tendency to implicate the witness in a criminal charge, or expose him to a penalty. Burns v. Kempshall, 24 Wend. 360.

The court is to determine whether the answers he may give could directly or indirectly criminate him, by furnishing evidence of his guilt, by his own admission; even if it only established one fact out of many, which, taken together, would be sufficient to warrant his conviction, his privilege should be allowed. If the court holds that the answer might in any way criminate the witness, the witness is not to be compelled to explain how he would be criminated by such answer. Re Tappin, 9 How. Pr. 384; Curtis v. Knox, 2 Denio, 341.

And also where answers to a question would have disgraced the witness, the privilege may be pleaded and must be allowed by the court. People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 250; Cowen & Hill's notes to Phil. Ev. 521; 1 Burr. Ev. 244; 1 Greenl. Ev. 454; Lohman v. People, 1 N. Y. 379; affirming 2 Barb. 216.

Refusal to answer a proper question in the examination before a referee is punishable as for a conerty of the citizen, and he can have neither formulated charge, nor counsel, nor witnesses, nor appeal, nor adjournment, that he may establish his right to credence and liberty.

If this law is left to operate in a single case, or in any view of its application, no relief can be possible in any case. How can a person secure release on habeas corpus where the record discloses no error and his only hope is to reverse a finding of fact clearly within the discretion of the court below.

Douglass v. Wickwire, 14 Conn. 491; Fox v. Hoyt, 12 Conn. 491; State v. Bloom, 17 Wis. 521; Stewart's Case, 1 Abb. Pr. 210; Church, Habeas Corpus, 373, 481.

A legislative enactment is not necessarily "the law of the land," nor is a court in proceeding under such enactment necessarily proceeding according to "due course of law" as those words are used in our Constitution.

See Cooley, Const. L. pp. 488-485, and notes; Camp v. Rogers, 44 Conn. 291.

Acts interfering with constitutional rights in a way similar to the law in question have been adopted in only one State in the Union, and that Act has been already declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the State.

Ex parte Grace, 12 Iowa, 206.

The Statute is in violation of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution in that it deprives the prisoner of the equal protection of the law in subjecting him to inquiries under summary proceedings and penalties to which other citizens who procure liquor are not liable.

San Mateo County v. South Pac. R. Co. 7 Sawy. 517; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 13.

This Statute makes that a contempt which is not a proper subject of contempt.

Rapalje, Contempt, p. 82, and cases there cited.

A police regulation, summary in its nature and directly interfering with the right of personal liberty, must have a definite object clearly attainable, and that object must be undeniably in the interest of public order and safety. If its purpose is in the line of investigation, it must obviously be confined to crimes actually committed, and dangers imminent and well defined.

Tiedeman, Pol. Power, pp. 1-16; Lakeview v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 192; State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189.

Messrs. William Hamersley and Francis H. Parker, for appellee:

The Statute in question is a police regulation designed in the words of Judge Cooley, "to preserve the public order, and prevent offenses against the State."

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 706.

Its particular purpose is to prevent violations of the Liquor Laws. It is in aid of and supplementary to the general laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, and is part and parcel of the Liquor Laws of the State.

State v. Brennan's Liquors, 25 Conn. 278; State v. Wilcox, 42 Conn. 864; State v. Thomas, 47 Conn. 546.

Our statutes authorize the bank commissioners, railroad commissioners and insurance commissioner to make investigations, summon witnesses and examine them, and provide for punishments by commitments for contempt or otherwise, when witnesses refuse to testify.

Gen. Stat. §§ 1827, 2859, 2896, 3430: Noyes v. Byrbee, 45 Conn. 382.

The Act in question requires the person who has been convicted of drunkenness to disclose certain facts that are peculiarly within his knowledge, which facts the Legislature has determined should be disclosed for the public good. He stands simply in the place of a wit-tempt. Lathrop v. Clapp, 40 N. Y. 323, affirming 23 How. Pr. 423.

A witness may be punished for refusal to answer a material or competent question, although he attended the examination and was sworn without a subpoena. People v. Marston, 18 Abb. Pr. 257.

A witness duly subpoenaed, refusing to testify before a notary public for no other reason than because he is instructed by his attorney not to answer may be committed by the notary for contempt. Re Merkle, 40 Kan. 27.

Under the Georgia Code the proprietor or publisher of a newspaper is a competent witness in a criminal prosecution for libel therein; and he may also be punished for contempt of court as any other witness refusing to testify. Pledger v. State, 77 Ga. 242.

Refusal of a witness to answer proper questions before the grand jury, and again when brought into court, assigning no reason, is a contempt for which he may be ordered to pay a fine and to stand committed until he shall appear and answer said questions, or until the further order of the court. Re Harris, 4 Utah, 5.

But where a judgment debtor was asked as to the amount and value of an incumbrance on his property six months before the examination, it was held that such question was not necessarily within his power to answer, and an answer in substance that he was unable to give the information asked for was not necessarily evasive, or a refusal to comply with the order requiring him to answer the question; for it did not look to a discovery of property, but to a discovery of incumbrances. Wicker v. Dresser, 14 How. Pr. 465.

The refusal of a witness to answer a question not pertinent to the issue is not a contempt. Ex parte Zeelandelaar, 71 Cal. 238.

Courts should exercise great care in compelling witnesses to answer questions where the witness claims the privilege, and has brought himself within the rule, as it is a matter exclusively between the court and the witness. The opposite party cannot object. He has no right to insist upon the privilege, and require the court to exclude it on that ground; as the witness has the right to waive his privilege, and if ordered to testify, he may refuse and be committed. Cloyes v. Thayer, 3 Hill, 564; Thomas v. Newton, 1 Mood. & M. 48, note a; Treat v. Browning, 4 Conn. 408; Southard v. Rexford, 6 Cow. 259; Cowen & Hill's notes to Phil. Ev. 784 b; Forbes v. Willard, 54 Barb. 520.

When a witness is directed by a referee before whom he is examined to answer a question, and he refuses to answer, he is guilty of contempt, provided the question is a proper one. Lathrop v. Clapp, 40 N. Y. 323, affirming 23 How. Pr. 423.

No appeal lies from a judgment imposing a penalty for contempt of court. Teller v. People, 7 Colo. 451.

Power of court to punish.

The power which the court possesses of punishing disobedience of its mandates is one of the safeguards for the due administration of justice. It is a necessary attribute of the court. The Statute ness before an investigating officer, and is treated as witnesses in like proceedings are lawfully treated. He may be compelled to testify, but not against himself.

Const. art. 1, § 9. U. S. Const. 5th Amend.

Witnesses who refuse to testify are committed for contempt by the courts.

Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 476; People v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74.

Witnesses who refuse to testify in preliminary investigations authorized by statute have always been punishable by commitment for contempt, and were so punishable when our Constitution was adopted.

Goddard v. State, 12 Conn. 448; Merriman v. Bryant, 14 Conn. 205; Seeley v. Bridgeport, 3 New Eng. Rep. 590, 53 Conn. 1.

Punishment by commitment to jail of persons guilty of contempt, including witnesses refusing to testify, was part of the "law of the land," or the "due course of law," at the time of the adoption of our Constitution.

Gen. Stat. 1808, pp. 281, 372; Eilenbecker v. Plymouth County Dist. Ct. 134 U. S. 31, 38 L. ed. 801; Cartwright's Case, 114 Mass. 238; Middlebrook v. State, 43 Conn. 257; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616.

As there can be no trial of the person interrogated, he is not denied a trial by jury by the Statute.

Waldo v. Spencer, 4 Conn. 71, 78.

But if the commitment of the person required to disclose by this Statute can in any sense be said to be a punishment for drunkenness, then the Statute is still constitutional; because the crime of drunkenness is one of those petty offenses always tried by single magistrates in our State before the adoption of the Constitution, and therefore not affected by that instrument.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant was convicted of intoxication, and was required to disclose, under the Act of 1889, chap. 167,* "under oath, when, where, how, and from whom he procured the liquor by which his intoxication was produced." He refused "to make such disclosure." Thereupon the magistrate (the judge of the Police Court of Hartford) before whom the trial was had proceeded "to commit the ac-

*That statute provides that if a person be found guilty of intoxication, and refuses on request of the prosecuting officer to disclose under oath when, where, how and from whom he procured the liquor by which his intoxication was produced, the magistrate before whom the trial was had shall commit him to the county jail for contempt of court. [Rep.]

declares it, and, in so doing, gives no new power, but merely defines and limits an ancient rule of the common law. To allow such offenders immunity for their misconduct would be a practical surrender of a trust which has been confided to the judiciary by the people for their own protection and benefit. Negus v. Brooklyn, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 471.

The power of a court to punish for an alleged contempt of its authority, though undoubted, is in its nature arbitrary, and its exercise is not to be upheld, except under the circumstances and in the manner prescribed by law. It is essential to the validity of proceedings in contempt, subjecting a party to fine and imprisonment, that they show a case in point of jurisdiction within the provisions of the law by which such proceedings are authorized, for mere presumptions and intendments are not to be indulged in their support. Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 412.

Power to punish for contempt is a judicial and not a legislative one. Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 L. ed. 377; Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313; 2 Bancroft, Hist. U. S. 414; 3 Bancroft, Hist. U. S. 56, 101; 1 Bl. Com. 163-163; 1 Hallam, Const. Hist. 224, 225.

"The summary power to commit and punish for contempts tending to obstruct or degrade the administration of justice," the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts well said, in Cartwright's Case, 114 Mass. 230, 238, "is inherent in courts of chancery and other superior courts as essential to the execution of their powers and to the maintenance of their authority, and is part of the law of 13 L. R. A.

the land, within the meaning of Magna Charta and of the 12th article of our Declaration of Rights." The Declaration of Rights here referred to was that which formed part of the Constitution of Massachusetts, and contained the prohibition, inserted in most of the American Constitutions, against depriving any person of life, liberty or estate, except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. So in Cooper's Case, 32 Vt. 253, 257: "The power to punish for contempt is inherent in the nature and constitution of a court. It is a power not derived from any statute, but arising from necessity; implied, because it is necessary to the exercise of all other powers." Without such power, it was observed in Easton v. State, 30 Ala. 522, the administration of the law would be in continual danger of being thwarted by the lawless. To the same effect are Watson v. Williams, 36 Miss. 344; Johnston v. Com. 1 Bibb, 598; Clark v. People, 1 Ill. 266; Com. v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 408; Ex parte Hamilton, 51 Ala. 68; Rodman v. State, 23 Ind. 212; People v. Turner, 1 Cal. 153; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 388; and numerous cases cited in note to Clark v. People, 1 Ill. 266, in 12 Am. Dec. 178. See also Queen v. Lefroy, L. R. 8 Q. B. 134.

Due process of law.

The principles involved in this caption have received extended treatment in the following cases: People v. O'Brien, 2 L. R. A. 255, 111 N. Y. 1; Chauvin v. Valiton, 3 L. R. A. 194, 8 Mont. 451; Jensen v. Union Pac. R. Co. (Utah) 4 L. R. A. 724; Re Gannon (R. L.) 5 L. R. A. 359.

cused for contempt of court to the common jail" for ten days. On a writ of habeas corpus he was brought before a judge of the superior court. The sheriff's return set out the proceedings in the police court, and the mittimus issued thereon. The complainant demurred to the return, because, he says, the Statute under which the proceedings were had is obnoxious to constitutional provisions. The judge overruled the demurrer, and the complainant appealed.

Provisions for disclosures by persons found intoxicated or arrested for intoxication first appeared in the Statute of 1854, and have since remained there, with some changes from time to time. Until 1889 disclosures were at the option of the prisoner, and could only be made before conviction; and, upon being fairly made, they contemplated the discharge of the intoxicated person. The Statute of 1889 made a radical change. It provides for disclosures only after conviction, does not discharge the prisoner, and the disclosure is made compulsory. Whether this Act is a substitute for the Statute previously existing, or is in addition thereto, is not now a material question.

The first ground of demurrer is that the Statute "is a deprivation of the right to a trial by jury, as provided by section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of Connecticut." This objection misconceives the nature and character of the proceeding before the police court. The appellant was not then before the court as a defendant in a criminal prosecution. That had been his position; but upon his conviction that was changed, and he became, so far as this case is concerned, merely a witness. He was in no sense on trial,—no one was,—and therefore was not in jeopardy. The proceeding was not judicial, but ministerial. For more than a century and a half we have had upon the statute-book a law authorizing the grand jurors in the several towns to meet and advise and inquire into the offenses that had been committed, with power to summon and examine witnesses, and, if need be, to punish for contempt. Gen. Stat. § 91. This proceeding is but an extension of the same power to other officers for the same general purpose, namely, the protection of society, by preventing crime through the detection and punishment of offenders. The magistrate acting in an administrative, and not in a judicial, capacity, the witness being in no jeopardy, and exposed to no detriment, provided he testifies fairly, this section of the Constitution is not applicable.

The second ground of demurrer is that "such a commitment on said Statute is a deprivation of liberty without due process of law, as forbidden by section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution of Connecticut." Punishment for contempt by a court or other tribunal duly authorized is "due process of law" within the meaning of the Constitution. The right and duty of the State to protect its jurisdiction and dignity by punishing for contempt, in proper cases, through its officers, is the sacred right of self-defense.

The third ground of demurrer is that "the matter made a contempt of court by the Statute is not a proper contempt, and it is incompetent for the Legislature to suspend or abrogate the prisoner's constitutional prerogatives by making such refusal a contempt, and providing a summary commitment therefor, since the refusal is entirely disconnected with any proceeding pending before the court, and has no relation whatever to the dignity or duty of the court, or to the administration of justice in any present or future case." This objection rests entirely on the assumption that the testimony of the prisoner, when obtained, will be of no use; in effect, that the Statute is a mere wanton exercise of power. But this assumption is not well founded. The Statute provides that the testimony shall be certified and forwarded to the State's attorney. Its utility is a matter for the Legislature to determine, and it has done so. It is not for the appellant or the court to say that the information is of no value, and has no relation "to the administration of justice in any present or future case."

The fourth ground of demurrer is that "the Statute is in violation of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, in that it deprives the prisoner of the equal protection of the law in subjecting him to inquiries under summary proceedings and penalties to which other citizens who procure liquor are not liable." All offenders against law or good morals are liable to be subjected to some inconveniences from which others are exempt. Of those so offending some will be detected and made to suffer such inconveniences, while others may escape. It was not the purpose of this amendment to place all such offenders upon an equal footing.

There is one error assigned that does not seem to be raised by the demurrer, namely, that "the court erred in ruling and holding that the Statute is a valid statute, not contrary to public policy and natural justice." Perhaps we have sufficiently answered this; but we will add that it is the duty of all good citizens, when legally required so to do, to testify to any facts within their knowledge affecting public interests; and no one has a natural right to be protected in his refusal to discharge this duty. Public policy does not forbid, but, on the contrary, often requires, legislation to facilitate the administration of justice.

We find no error in the judgment appealed from.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

GRAND TRUNK R. CO. of Canada.

1. An agreement by a common carrier to give one shipper a favor and advantage over others by a rebate is illegal at common law.
2. Contracts concerning interstate transportation must be regarded as made upon the basis and with the understanding that changes in the law applicable to them may be made by Congress, and there is no vested right in the law as it exists at the time they are made.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a ruling of the Essex County Court in favor of defendant directing a pro forma judgment in its favor upon an agreed statement of facts in an action brought to recover rebates alleged to be due to plaintiff under a shipping contract. Judgment affirmed.

The statement of facts set out, in 1886 plaintiffs agreed to furnish defendant 170 car-loads of lumber to be freighted, in consideration of which agreement defendant promised to pay plaintiffs $6 per car-load; that defendant was to receive for transporting such lumber $38 on each car-load, which was the regular tariff rate between the points to which the contract related; that before the commencement of this suit plaintiffs had furnished to defendant 170 car-loads of lumber and had fully performed their agreement; that relying upon said agreement, and to carry out and fulfill the same, plaintiffs had purchased said 170 car-loads of lumber and hauled the same to Island Pond, the designated place of shipment, prior to January 1, 1887; that 97 car-loads of said lumber were delivered to and carried by defendant subsequently to April 5, 1887, on which the agreed $6 per car-load had not been paid.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The agreed facts, in substance, are that prior to the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act the defendant promised to pay the plaintiffs a rebate of $6 upon each of the 170 car-loads of lumber which the plaintiffs were to deliver to the defendant for transportation from Island Pond to points in Massachusetts; and that the usual charges made to all shippers for such freight to such designation was $38 per car-load; that prior to April 5, 1887 (the day on which the Interstate Commerce Act took effect), the plaintiffs had delivered 78 car-loads for transportation as aforesaid, and after that date, had delivered the remaining 97 car-loads, all of which the defendant had carried to its destination; that the defendant has paid the $6 rebate to the plaintiffs on the 78 car loads, and this suit is brought to recover such rebate on the 97 car-loads. The plaintiffs have in all respects fully performed their contract, and the sole question is, Can they recover the rebate on the lumber delivered for transportation according to the contract, after said April 5? It was suggested in argument that it did not affirmatively appear but that the $6 rebate was allowed to all other patrons of the defendant shipping lumber to the same points, and so no discrimination was made in the contract in the plaintiffs' favor. But this is not the fair construction of the agreed facts, and the counsel on both sides have argued the case upon the theory that this rebate was a favor and advantage given the plaintiffs, and not enjoyed by other patrons.

Many sound reasons might be urged in support of the proposition that Congress, upon those principles of justice and equity which underlie all law, cannot pass a law which will destroy or impair the obligation of existing contracts, except in bankruptcy and other instances specially enumerated in the Constitution. The Federal Constitution expressly prohibits the passage of such laws by the States, but is silent respecting the power of Congress so to do. But, whatever may be said upon that question, it is not involved in this case. The agreed case is that, "unless the plaintiffs' right to recover is barred" by the Interstate Commerce Act, the plaintiffs are to recover. That right of recovery is not barred if Congress, in the passage of the Interstate Act, exceeded its power. It exceeded its power if it impaired the obligation of an existing contract. This is the syllogism that the argument upon this branch of the case is reduced to. The obligation of a contract in law is that element of duty or promise which a party can be compelled to perform. If performance cannot be compelled, there is no legal obligation in the contract. The contract in question, as it stood when made and down to April 5, 1887, is to be tested by the principles of the common law. At common law, common carriers were held to be persons who exercised their calling for the public good, upon equal terms, and with the same facilities to all their customers. They could not lawfully exercise their calling by granting advantages to one customer which they denied to another, but were held to the duty of serving all alike. Their calling is one public in its nature, and the common law exacted of them a strict impartiality in their dealings with the public. If the plaintiffs could transport their lumber to market for $6 per car-load less than their neighbors, they would very soon have a monopoly of the business. Many cases might be cited to show that, at common law, all such special terms and favoritism are illegal. Messenger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 36 N. J. L. 407, is a representative case in which Beasley, Ch. J., states the doctrine of the common law with great clearness and force. See also Audenried v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 68 Pa. 370; McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co. 52 N. H. 430; New England Exp. Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 57 Me. 188; Pierce, Railroads, 498.

This contract, then, at the common law, had no legal binding force, so long as it was executory,—no obligation which could be enforced, and therefore no obligation which the Interstate Commerce Act could either impair or destroy. The Interstate Act, therefore, did not, in its operation upon this contract, disturb any vested rights, because no legal rights were vested when the contract was made. So long as the parties to the contract executed it, each was safe from any liability to the other by reason of such performance. In such cases the law leaves the parties just where they leave themselves.

In this case it is to be noted that the contract called for a transportation of the lumber through three States. Such carriage, therefore, is commerce between the States, within the meaning of article 1, § 8, of the Federal Constitution. Such commerce is solely regulated by Congress, and, when parties make contracts to engage in interstate commerce, they are held to do so upon the basis and with the understanding that changes in the law applicable to their contracts may be made. There can, in the nature of things, be no vested right in an existing law which precludes its change or repeal, nor vested right in the omission to legislate upon a particular subject which exempts a contract from the effect of subsequent legislation upon its subject matter by competent legislative authority. Cooley, Const. Lim. 284, 574; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140; Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 214, 6 L. ed. 606; State v. Holmes, 38 N. H. 225. The power to regulate commerce between the States is one given expressly in the Constitution to Congress. The Interstate Act was called into being by reason of the making of contracts like the one at bar. Unjust discrimination was one of the chief evils in transportation which Congress attempted to end by this Act, and we see no reason why the Act could not as properly put an end to a contract already working the mischief as to prohibit the making of one in the future. The case, then, comes to this. The plaintiffs seek to enforce a contract which is prohibited by law. The doctrine is elementary that, whenever the plaintiff is compelled, in order to make out his case, to show the illegal contract, he cannot recover. Here the rebate of $6 is the illegal feature of this contract. This rebate is the precise thing sued for. The plaintiffs are compelled to prove that the defendant made an illegal promise to pay as the gist of their right to recover. Such promise is not enforceable.

Judgment for defendant affirmed.

Held, that he was not entitled to recover anything for his services, the contract for each month being an entire one, to wit, to serve an entire month for an entire sum, and he having failed to perform his contract for any one month because of his breach of the implied condition that he would serve his employer honestly.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Municipal Court of St. Paul in favor

NOTE.—Entire contract must be performed before wages can be demanded.

It has been held, in England, that if a party hired for a certain time so conduct himself as to justify his discharge, he shall forfeit the current salary even for the time for which he has served. Turner v. Robinson, 5 Barn. & Ad. 789. See also Lilley v. Elwin, 11 Q. B. 742; Baillie v. Kell, 4 Bing. N. C. 638; Amor v. Fearon, 9 Ad. & El. 551; Beach v. Mullin, 34 N. J. L. 343.

To justify a discharge, there must be, on the part of the servant, either moral misconduct, pecuniary or otherwise, willful disobedience, or habitual neglect. Callo v. Brouncker, 4 Car. & P. 518.

But this doctrine has been denied in more recent cases, and it is now held that misconduct may be sufficient to justify a discharge, although it does not include moral turpitude. Smith v. Thompson, 8 C. B. 44; 3 Wait, Act. and Def. 600.

A servant who leaves his master's service before the expiration of the month, without excuse and by his own willful fault, can recover nothing for the portion of the month for which he has worked. Nelchka v. Esterly, 29 Minn. 146.

Where a servant, whose wages are due and payable periodically, as quarterly, monthly or weekly, refuses to serve in the manner contracted for, or is rightfully discharged at any intervening period between the days when his wages are due, he can recover nothing for that portion of time during which he has served since the last periodical payment of wages. Beach v. Mullin, 34 N. J. L. 343.

When a servant is discharged for legal cause, he cannot recover for services rendered under the contract. Spain v. Arnett, 2 Stark. 256.

When a servant, whose wages are due periodically, refuses to perform his part of the contract, and so conducts himself that the master is justified in discharging him, he is not entitled to be paid any wages for that portion of time during which he has served since the last periodical payment of wages; that is to say, if a servant, whose wages are only due yearly, is rightfully discharged before the expiration of the year, he could recover nothing for services rendered previous to such discharge; and the same principle would apply to the case of a quarterly, monthly or weekly hiring. In any of such cases, if the servant fail to perform his part of the contract, or be rightfully discharged at any intervening period between the days when his wages are due, he can recover nothing. This is upon the principle that the contract was an entire contract, and the performance of the services for the whole time agreed upon was in the nature of a condition precedent to his right to recover any wages. Smith, Mast. and Serv. 118.

The propositions of law thus stated are supported by the following cases: Turner v. Robinson, 5 Car. & P. 15; Ridgway v. Hungerford Market Co. 3 Ad. & El. 171; Lilley v. Elwin, 11 Q. B. 742, 755, 757; Turner v. Mason, 14 Mees. & W. 112; Libhart v. Wood, 1 Watts & S. 235; Singer v. McCormick, 4 Watts & S. 226.

The principle is stated in similar language in 2 Parsons, Cont. 40, and 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. § 43.

Dishonesty of servant defeats right to wages.

In most cases full and faithful performance by plaintiff of his entire contract is a condition precedent to any recovery. Wood, Mast. & Serv. 167, of plaintiff in an action brought to recover salary alleged to be due plaintiff for services rendered to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. E. Bowe for appellant.

Messrs. Henry Johns and R. L. Johns, for respondent:

A servant whose wages are due periodically, even though employed for a definite time, and who is rightfully discharged, may nevertheless recover for the periods of service already completed.

A contract for hiring at so much per month is a hiring by the month—if nothing is said as to the term of service.

Beach v. Mullin, 34 N. J. L. 343.

Servant's contracts, though for a specified time, are deemed apportionable, and a servant who has been discharged for cause is still entitled to recover for the work actually done.

Respondent may recover for services performed during the fractional part of a month in which he was discharged, less such damages as appellant sustained by reason of his tortious act.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The allegations of the complaint are that the plaintiff performed labor and work for defendant for seven and a fraction months at an agreed sum per month, payable at the end of each month. The answer admits the employment at the sum alleged for each and every month that plaintiff should work for defendant, and that the plaintiff worked the length of time stated, but alleges, by way of defense, that during all the time of his service the plaintiff stole and appropriated to his own use large sums of defendant's money which came into his hands in the course of his employment, and that, as soon as defendant discovered the fact he discharged the plaintiff from his service. Upon the pleadings, therefore, the contract must be taken to have been a hiring by the month or from month to month, the wages being due and payable at the end of the month. Judgment having been ordered for plaintiff on the pleadings, it must be taken as true, as alleged in the answer, that during all of the time of plaintiff's service, viz., during each and every one of the months that he was in defendant's employment, he was constantly engaged in embezzling his employer's money. While the whole services were not performed under one entire contract, yet, as to each and every month by itself, the contract was an entire one, viz., to work an entire month for an entire price. A contract to pay a certain sum for a month's service is as entire in its consideration as is a contract to pay a certain sum for a single chattel. Beach v. Mullin, 34 N. J. L. 343. Therefore, to entitle plaintiff to recover the specified wages for any one month, he must have substantially performed the contract of service for that month. According to the settled doctrine of this court, had plaintiff, before the expiration of the month, abandoned the Fidelity is a condition precedent, whenever an agent seeks compensation from his principal. See Henderson v. Hydraulic Works, 9 Phila. 100.

There can be no part recovery for part performance. M'Millan v. Vanderlip, 12 Johns. 167.

Where the performance of work and labor is a condition precedent, to entitle the party to recover a fulfillment must be shown. Wolfe v. Howes, 20 N. Y. 202.

Conditions precedent have always been, and still are, strictly enforced by the courts of New York, and complete performance in precise accord with the contract insisted upon. See Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 183-188.

The burden is on the plaintiff to aver and prove a fulfillment of a condition precedent. Oakley v. Morton, 11 N. Y. 30.

Flagrant acts of dishonesty or crime which seriously affect the master's interest, continued during he service, might well be regarded as a bar to the recovery of wages, although the amount received and fraudulently appropriated might be far less than the amount fixed by the contract. Turner v. Kouwenhoven, 1 Cent. Rep. 267, 100 N. Y. 115.

In Spotswood v. Barrow, 5 Exch. 110, it was held that where a servant employed to collect moneys for his master retains a part of the money when it has come into his hands, and does not pay the same over, he has broken his contract, may be discharged by his master, and can recover no wages even for previous services rendered. And the same was held in Blencarn v. Hodges Distillery Co. 16 L. T. 13 L. R. A.

N. S. 608, although the servant, after using the moneys for himself, made them up afterwards, and although his failure to pay over other moneys was caused by mere carelessness or forgetfulness. And see Turner v. Robinson, 6 Car. & P. 15.

It is not the discharge that bars plaintiff's recovery, but plaintiff's misconduct. This is readily and conclusively shown by the familiar principle that, although there be a discharge before the time of service has expired, yet, where the discharge was wrongful, &c., where there was no misconduct by the servant to justify the discharge, the servant can recover. Perry v. Dickerson, 35 N. Y. 350.

The following cases sustain the principle that where the contract is an entirety the recovery of damages for its breach is not allowed, unless it appears that the conditions precedent have been duly performed. *Ketchum v. service without excuse, and by his own willful fault, he could have recovered nothing for the portion of the month he worked, because he would not in such case have performed his contract. Nelichka v. Esterly, 29 Minn. 146; Kohn v. Fandel, 29 Minn. 470. The same result would have followed, and on the same ground, had the defendant during the month, for good and sufficient cause, discharged the plaintiff from his service. But it was an implied condition of the contract that plaintiff should serve the defendant faithfully and honestly. Although only implied, this was as much a part of the contract as was the express condition as to the time of service, and the breach of the one was just as much a failure to perform the contract as would have been a breach of the other, and the consequences in both cases would be the same. Indeed, if there is any case of non-performance of an entire contract which should prevent a recovery, it is where a servant has been habitually embezzling his master's money which came into his hands in the course of his employment; for, in such cases, not only is the breach the result of positive dishonesty, but it goes to the very root of the subject matter of the contract of service. To allow the dishonest servant to recover the value of his services, less what the master can show by direct and positive proof (often impossible) he had stolen, would neither subserve the ends of justice nor tend to promote common honesty. Libhart v.

Wood, 1 Watts & S. 265. Of course substantial, and not exact, performance, accompanied with good faith, is all the law requires in the case of any contract to entitle a party to recover on it. Although a plaintiff be not absolutely free from fault or omission in every particular, the court will not turn him away if he has in good faith made substantial performance, but will enforce his rights on the one hand, and preserve the rights of the defendant on the other, by permitting a recoupment. Leeds v. Little, 42 Minn. 414; Elliott v. Caldwell, 43 Minn. 357, 9 L. R. A. 52.

Neither is the rule which we have applied to the present case to be extended so far as to forfeit wages already earned on a contract already fully performed and at an end. For example, in this case, had the plaintiff faithfully and honestly served the defendant during all of the first seven months, his wages for which were fully earned, they would not be forfeited by a breach of the contract for the seventh month. But in the present case, according to the answer, the plaintiff, whose duties included the constant and daily receipt of defendant's moneys, failed to perform his contract for any month, having willfully and dishonestly violated it in a most substantial and essential matter. Hence he never earned his wages for any of the months he was in defendant's service.

1. An ordinance requiring the conductor and driver of a street-car to keep a vigilant watch for all vehicles, and persons on foot, especially children, and stop the car in the shortest time and space possible on the first appearance of danger to them, is valid, under a charter which gives power to make ordinances not inconsistent with the general law, and to license and regulate the construction and operation of street railroads.

2. Failure to observe the degree of care in running a street-car which is re-

NOTE.—Scope and effect of municipal ordinances.

A street railway company by accepting a franchise from a municipal authority obligates itself to perform all the conditions precedent required in the grant and to comply strictly with such contractual matters as were stipulated for at the time it received its charter. *Pacific R. Although the proposition that the Legislature of a State is alone competent to make laws is true, yet it is also settled that it is competent for the Legislature to delegate to municipal corporations the power to make by-laws and ordinances, with appropriate sanctions, which, when authorized, have the force, in favor of the municipality and against persons bound thereby, of laws passed by the Legislature of the State (Heland v. Lowell, 8 Allen, 407; Brick Presby. Church v. New York, 5 Cow. 538; St. Louis v. Boffinger, 19 Mo. 13, 15, per Gamble, J.; St. 18 L. R. A.

The terms "by-law," "ordinances," and "municipal regulation" have substantially the same meaning, and are defined to be "the laws of the corporate district, made by the authorized body, in distinction from the general law of the State." They are local regulations for the government of the inhabitants of the particular place. State v. Lee, 29 Minn. 451-453 (1882) and cases, Vanderburg, J.; Anderson, Law Dict. 738.

Liability of street-car company for injury to pedestrians.

For injuries occasioned by negligence, street rail-quired by a valid ordinance imposing a penalty therefor renders a street-car company, which has undertaken to obey ordinances in consideration of the right to use the public streets for its tracks, liable to a person who is injured in consequence, although such degree of care may be higher than that which would otherwise be required by law.

TRANSFER from the St. Louis Court of Appeals of an action appealed to that court from the St. Louis Circuit Court, which was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence, and in which a judgment had been entered in favor of plaintiff. Reversed.

Statement by Sherwood, J.:

Action by infant, seven years of age, through next friend, for injuries received by the former in consequence of coming in contact with one of the defendant Company's cars, which was alleged to have happened by reason of the negligence of that Company, and also because of its negligent failure to observe the requirements of subdivision 4, § 1246, art. 6, Rev. Ord. 1887, of the City of St. Louis. This was the substance of the petition.

Said subdivision 4 reads as follows: "Fourth. The conductor and driver of each car shall keep a vigilant watch for all vehicles and persons on foot, especially children, either on the track or moving towards it, and on the first appearance of danger to such persons or vehicles the car shall be stopped in the shortest time and space possible." Section 1251 of the same article provides that "any person, corporation, company, or co-partnership, or the president, superintendent, or manager thereof, violating or failing to comply with any of the foregoing provisions of this article, except as otherwise provided for, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $5 nor more than $500."

The answer of the defendant was substantially a general denial, as well as the following: "Defendant . . . charges the fact to be that the boy, Bernard Fath, sustained certain injuries at the time alleged, which injuries were caused by his own acts and conduct, in this: that while one of defendant's cars was moving along Columbus Street, in the City of St. Louis, in a usual and lawful manner, said child, without the knowledge of defendant's driver, suddenly and unexpectedly, carelessly, and negligently, ran up to and against the moving car in such manner as to cause it to fall across the track upon which said car was moving; that the driver of said car at the time observed proper care and diligence in the discharge of his duties, and was not guilty of any negligence in the premises. The defendant says that the injuries, if any, sustained by said child . . . were caused by the improper acts and negligent conduct of said child as aforesaid, and by the negligence of said child's parents in permitting said child to be upon the public streets without the care or control of an older person, and were not caused by the negligence or fault of this defendant, or any of its agents or servants." The evidence on behalf of plaintiff tended to show that the plaintiff, Bernard Fath, was a boy between four and five years old when he was injured; that on the 26th day of July, 1884, between 6 and 7 o'clock, and when it was still daylight, said Bernard was on Columbus Street, near Carroll, in the City of St. Louis; that he was either upon defendant's tracks, or approaching same, as one of defendant's cars moved northwardly along Columbus Street; that the driver of defendant's car either did or by the exercise of way companies are liable, as others are, upon common-law principles, and no more so. Louisville & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 2 Duvall, 556, 558; 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1424.

As street-cars are no more dangerous to pedestrians in the street than carriages, omnibuses, or any other vehicle drawn by horses, no more care can be required of street-railway companies in the management of their cars and horses in the street than is required of the driver or owner of any other vehicle, viz., ordinary care. Pendleton St. R. Co. v. Shires, 18 Ohio St. 255; Pendleton St. R. Co. v. Stallman, 22 Ohio St. 1, 26; Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. McDonnell, 43 Md. 534, 558; Unger v. Forty-Second St. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 497; Gilligan v. New York & H. R. Co. 1 E. D. Smith, 453, 457.

Where a party is situated on a street, where he has a legal right to be, in passing over it, it is the legal duty of the driver of a car approaching him to make a vigilant use of his senses to discover whether the party is in a position of peril, and to control the movement of his car, so far as possible, to avoid injury to him. Watson v. Broadway & Seventh Ave. R. Co. 6 N. Y. S. R. 538.

One driving horses along the streets of a city is bound to anticipate that passengers on foot may be at the crossings, and to take reasonable care not to injure them; if he fails to look out for them, or when he sees, does not, so far as in his power, avoid them, he is chargeable with negligence. Murphy v. Orr, 96 N. Y. 14.

The driver of a vehicle in the streets of a city is bound to be vigilant to discover anyone exposed to danger, and if he fails to look in the direction in which he is going and an accident happens in consequence, he is chargeable with negligence. The driver of a street-car is not excused from the performance of this duty by the necessity of making change for a passenger. Hyland v. Yonkers R. Co. 15 N. Y. S. R. 324.

If the deceased child exercised due care, and the injury was caused solely by the negligence of defendant's driver, the defendant was liable without regard to the question whether it was negligence in the parents to let the child go with so young an attendant. Nor would negligence upon the part of so young a child as the deceased, when there was no negligence upon the part of the parents or the attendant, absolve the defendant from liability. Thl v. Forty-Second St. & C. St. F. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 317.

An infant, when suing in his own behalf for injuries to his person arising from the negligence of others, must be free from the imputation of negligence on his part tending to produce the damages sought to be recovered. The rule is the same, whether the action be by an infant or an adult. Burke v. Broadway & Seventh Ave. R. Co. 49 Barb. 539. See notes to People v. Newton (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 175; Rupard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Ky.) 7 L. R. A. 316.

proper care and diligence could have seen the boy, and that he was in danger, and could have stopped the car in time to prevent the accident, but that he negligently and carelessly ran against him, resulting in personal injury.

Plaintiff's testimony was conflicting as to the extent of the accident,—whether a wheel dragged between the brake-rod and the front wheel until the car was stopped,—but the evidence tended to show that he was knocked down, bruised, and injured; that there were no bones broken; but that he sustained substantial injuries, and suffered pains, and was laid up in bed for a period of time, and still showed some effects of the injury, in the way of stiffness, nervousness, etc. Plaintiff also offered in evidence the fourth clause afore-said.

The defendant objected to the introduction of the ordinance on various grounds; among them, that "said fourth clause of said ordinance is not a lawful rule governing diligence or negligence in this State; that the same is illegal and void, and against the law of the land; and because the city had no right or authority to enact the same." But the court overruled said objection, and said ordinance was admitted.

The evidence on the part of defendant tended to show that, owing to some local disturbance of a trifling character, a crowd of men, women, and children had gathered on the sidewalk in front of a house on the east side of Columbus Street; that the plaintiff, Bernard, was in the crowd; that, as the car came along, a policeman suddenly scared and scattered the crowd; that the children ran in various directions; that plaintiff ran obliquely in a northwestern direction without looking ahead; that he struck the car between the mule and the dash-board; that he fell, and was caught by the brake-rod and dragged along, but that the car was stopped in time to prevent the front wheel from passing over him; that the driver of defendant's car acted with great promptness and diligence in stopping the car, and that he could not have become aware of the dangerous approach of plaintiff earlier than he did. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $600, and there was judgment accordingly, and on appeal to the St. Louis Court of Appeals that judgment was reversed and the cause remanded; but one of the judges of that court deeming that decision contrary to the decision of this court in Liddy v. St. Louis R. Co., 40 Mo. 506, the cause has been transferred here in conformity with section 6, art. 6, of the Constitution.

Sections 20, 23, and 25, art. 9, of the Constitution require that the charter of the city shall be in harmony with and subject to the Constitution and laws of Missouri.

Section 26, art. 3, of the City Charter also declares: "The mayor and assembly shall have power within the city by ordinance not inconsistent with the Constitution or any law of this State or of this charter, . . .

(2) to establish, open, vacate, alter, widen, extend, pave, or otherwise improve and sprinkle all streets, avenues, sidewalks, . . . and to regulate the use thereof; . . .

(5) to license, tax, and regulate . . . street-railroad cars, livery and sale stables, hackney carriages, private carriages, broughams, buggies, wagons, omnibuses, carts, drays, and other vehicles, and all other business, trades, avocations, or professions whatever; (10) to impose, collect, and enforce fines, forfeitures, and penalties for the breach of any city ordinance. (11) To grant to persons or corporations the right to construct railways in the city, subject to the right to amend, alter, or repeal any such grant, in whole or in part, and to regulate and control the same as to their fares, hours, and frequency of trips, and repair of their tracks, and the kind of rails and vehicles."

And sections 1 and 2 of article 10 of the charter provide that "the municipal assembly shall have power, by ordinance, to determine all questions arising with reference to street railroads in the corporate limits of the city, whether such questions may involve the construction of such street railroads, granting the right of way, or regulating and controlling them after their completion; and also shall have power to sell the franchise or right of way for such street railroads to the highest bidder, or, as a consideration therefor, to impose a per capita tax on the passengers transported, or an annual tax on the gross receipts of such railroad, or on each car; and no street railroad shall hereafter be incorporated or built in the City of St. Louis except according to the above and other conditions in this charter, and in such manner and to such extent as may be provided by ordinance." "The assembly shall have power to regulate the time and manner of running cars, and the rates of fare on street railroads now or hereafter to be built, and the sale of tickets and exchange thereof between the several companies, and to tax the property of street-railroad companies in such manner as may be provided by law."

That charter also contains this provision: "All ordinances in force at the time this charter and scheme go into operation, not inconsistent therewith, shall remain in full force until altered or repealed by the assembly." Section 1, art. 16. The ordinance in question was enacted December 27, 1859. Section 20, art. 12, of the Constitution also makes provision that "no law shall be passed by the General Assembly granting the right to construct and operate a street railroad within any city, town, village, or on any public highway, without first acquiring the consent of the local authorities having control of the street or highway proposed to be occupied by such street railroad; and the franchises so granted shall not be transferred without similar assent first obtained."

Messrs. Hitchcock, Madill & Finkelnburg, for appellant:

Clause 4 of section 1246 of article 6 of the Revised Ordinances of 1887 of the City of St. Louis is void in so far as it undertakes to fix a standard of diligence or liability for negligence in civil suits at common law against street railway corporations, Kath v. Tower Grove & L. R. Co. 39 Mo. App. 447.

The ordinance in question requires defendant's servants in every case of danger to accomplish the utmost physical possibility which can be attained in stopping a car under any circumstances; a measure of diligence not required of a carrier even towards a passenger, much less in respect of a stranger.

A city ordinance cannot change the common-law liabilities of a civil nature between private parties, nor fix a new standard of negligence as a basis for an action on the case.

The right of a municipality to regulate the use of its streets by railways does not authorize it to change the fundamental rules of law governing the liabilities of a civil nature—neither to increase nor to diminish them. Ordinances must be in harmony with the general laws of the State.

A similar question has recently been presented in Hays v. Gainesville St. R. Co., 70 Tex. 602, and the same view was there taken in regard to it.

Our Constitution makes a license to street railway companies dependent solely upon the will of the town or city in which it is to be exercised.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Though the subdivision of the ordinance under discussion has been in existence for over thirty years, its legal validity has never been adjudicated by this court, though incidentally touched upon in several instances. Liddy v. St. Louis R. Co. 40 Mo. 506; McCarthy v. Cass Ave. & F. G. R. Co. 92 Mo. 536, 10 West. Rep. 331; Dunn v. Cass Ave. & F. G. R. Co. 98 Mo. 652.

In Liddy's Case the validity of the ordinance was not raised in any manner in the trial court, and of course any utterances in this court on the subject are not possessed of authoritative value. The same may be said of the other cases cited, which went off principally on the insufficiency of the testimony on which to base verdicts for the plaintiffs. The point in hand, the legal validity of the ordinance, is therefore res integra, so far as adjudications of this court are concerned.

Nor does the case of Hays v. Gainesville St. R. Co., 70 Tex. 602, cited for plaintiffs, discuss or pass upon the status of such an ordinance; its validity is simply assumed. Proceeding, then, to inquire into the validity of the ordinance, it may be admitted, at the outset, that it is beyond the power of a municipal corporation by its legislative action directly to create a "civil duty enforceable at common law;" for this is an exercise of power of sovereignty, belonging alone to the State. This position is fully sustained by the authorities cited on behalf of the defendant.

But if we may assume, as seems to be the case from the powers conferred on the city by the provisions of its charter, as well as by section 20 of article 12 of the Constitution, already quoted, that the defendant Company was allowed to lay its tracks upon the streets of the city upon conditions of yielding obedience to the municipal ordinances then or thereafter to be enacted, thereby entering into contractual relations with the city; if this has been done, and the ordinance quoted has been violated by the defendant Company, resulting in injury, as the petition alleges,—then these questions arise: What is the result of such violation, and what, if any, the liability of the defendant, and to whom liable, and the nature and extent of its liability in consequence of such violation? Now, if the case in hand arose upon a statute, and contractual relations had been entered into between the defendant Company and the city, whereby the former had engaged with the latter to perform a public duty in consideration of the benefits to be derived from laying its tracks and operating its road on the streets of the city, the authorities seem to be unanimous in expression that a breach of the public duty thus created, resulting in injury to any person, would render the defendant Company liable to such person for the injury thus received.

The principle here asserted is of ancient date, and is announced in the early case of Mayor of Lyme Regis v. Henley, 1 Bing. N. C. 222, citing earlier cases, where it is said that where a matter of public and general concern is involved, "and the king, for the benefit of the public, has made a certain grant imposing certain public duties, and that grant has been accepted, we are of opinion that the public may enforce the performance of those duties by indictment, and the individuals peculiarly injured, by action."

In Goshen & S. Turnp. Co. v. Sears, 7 Conn. 86, it was ruled that the turnpike company, by accepting the charter of incorporation, making the road, and receiving tolls of passengers, became bound to keep the road in repair; and, where a traveler was injured by reason of failure of the company to repair its road, he was held entitled to recover.

To the same effect, see Wilson v. Susquehannah Turnp. R. Co., 21 Barb. 68, and cases cited. In Conrad v. Trustees of Rhaca, 16 N. Y. 158, and Hickok v. Trustees of Plattsburgh, reported in the same volume, 161, note, the principle under discussion is thus formulated by Selden, J.: "That whenever an individual or corporation, for a consideration received from the sovereign power, has become bound by agreement, either express or implied, to do certain things, such individual or corporation is liable, in case of neglect to perform the agreement, not only to a public prosecution by indictment, but to a private action at the suit of any person injured by such neglect. In all such cases the contract made with the sovereign power is deemed to inure to the benefit of every individual interested in its performance." This, Judge Selden says, is the basis of Henley's Case, and of the series of the English cases upon which that case was decided. Sustaining the like view, see Adair v. Brady, 4 Hill, 630; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 84 N. Y. 889; Fullon F. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 37 N. Y. 648; Johnson v. Belden, 47 N. Y. 130.

In Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 310, it was ruled that where, by the charter of the city, an absolute duty is imposed upon the owners of tenement-houses to have places of egress to the roofs, and also to have fire-escapes upon such houses, this duty is for the benefit of the tenants; and for a breach thereof causing damage, a tenant may maintain an action against his landlord; Earl, J., remarking: "In Comyn's Digest, Action upon Statute (F), is laid down as the rule that 'in every case where a statute enacts or prohibits a thing for the benefit of a person he shall have a remedy upon the same statute for the thing enacted for his advantage, or for the recompense of a wrong done to him contrary to the said law.'"

In the Law of Torts, it is said by the distinguished author: "If the duty imposed is obviously meant to be a duty to the public, and also to individuals, and the penalty is made payable to the state or to an informer, the right of an individual injured to maintain an action on the case for a breach of the duty owing to him will be unquestionable." Cooley, Torts, 784.

Upon these authorities, if the defendant Company had gained the franchise of the use of the streets of the city through a contract made with the State on certain conditions, either express or implied, and injury had resulted to anyone by reason of the contracting company failing to comply with such conditions, it is clear that a recovery could be had by such person, notwithstanding that a pecuniary penalty could also be inflicted by fine for the same breach of public duty. Parker v. Barnard, 135 Mass. 116, and cases cited.

principle dominate as to the contract in question and the duty assumed? And would not the consequences of the breach of that duty result in a like liability to a person injured by such breach, as well in this instance as in those already cited? It seems that an affirmative answer must be returned in this case as well as in any other; for here all the constituent elements of such liability exist, if the supposition with respect to the defendant Company accepting the existing and future ordinances as a condition of laying its tracks and running its cars on the streets of the city be true, to wit, the agreement, the consideration therefor, and the public duty to be performed as a consequence of such agreement; and under the terms of the Constitution, and of its charter, it is not to be doubted that the municipal authorities pro hac vice represent the sovereign power of the State, nor that the duty thus enjoined is none the less a public duty because the area of its performance is circumscribed within the boundaries of the municipality conferring the franchises. Sustaining this position are these authorities: Hayes v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410; Mason v. Shawneetown, 77 Ill. 588; Siemens v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418; Bott v. Pratt, 38 Minn. 823, and cases cited.

And it would seem that the municipal authorities had plenary power to enact the ordinance in question, at least so far as to provide a penalty for its breach. This being provided for, and the ordinance accepted by the defendant Company as a condition and as a consideration for the granting of the franchise, the result of a breach of such ordinance, causing injury to an individual, should be that already indicated; for it must be obvious that the ordinance in issue was for the benefit of all those who have occasion to use the streets of the city.

But it is said that "a city ordinance cannot change the common-law liability of a civil nature between private parties, nor fix a new standard of negligence for an action on the case." This may be true if the ordinance is to be construed as having the direct effect of changing a rule of the common law. But it must be remembered that "consent of parties shall alter the form and course of the law." Dormer's Case, 5 Coke, 40. And no obstacle is seen in the way in this case why the city should not be able, as a consideration of granting the franchise, to require an enhanced degree of care on behalf of street-car companies,—a degree of care certainly better suited to the crowded streets of cities than the rule of ordinary care, which the defendant Company so strenuously invokes. Surely there is nothing in such an ordinance, or the charter which supports it, lacking harmony with the Constitution and laws of this State. It is true the ordinance may not have a greater direct effect than to authorize the imposition of the prescribed penalty on a defaulting company; but the other consequences attend as inseparable incidents of a breach of duty, resulting in injury to an individual for whose protection the ordinance was clearly designed.

The case at bar is clearly distinguishable.

from that of Heeney v. Sprague, 11 R. I. 456, and other similar cases; for there the principle of a liability arising from the breach of contractual relations, whether express or implied, is distinctly recognized, as well as the principle that where the duty is merely one for the benefit of the municipality, or of the public at large, and not distributively to the public as composed of individuals, there the only recovery is the statutory penalty. Under this view, the ordinance in question was clearly admissible in evidence. On the theory already approved, evidence should also be introduced in connection therewith to show the contractual relations entered into between the defendant Company and the city, and the breach of duty consequent thereon; but at any rate the cause was improperly tried, inasmuch as the instructions given at the instance of the plaintiff and of the defendant were confusing and conflicting; the one for the former exacting the highest degree of diligence of the defendant's driver, while the instruction for the defendant only required the driver of the car to exercise diligence according to the common-law standard, —reasonable or ordinary care. For the reasons announced the judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals, reversing that of the Circuit Court, should be affirmed, and the cause remanded to the former court, to be proceeded with in conformity hereto.

STATE of Indiana, ex rel. Simeon T. YANCEY, Appl.,

Nelson J. HYDE.

(....Ind....)

1. The title of an Act which states that it is to abolish one office and create another is not defective on the ground that it does not do what it purports to do, by reason of the facts that the new office is the same as the old one, except in name, and that the Act was passed for the purpose of vacating the old office, of which there was an incumbent, in order to make a place for some other person.
2. The power of the Legislature to abolish an office and create another with similar duties in order to provide a place for a certain person is not limited by a constitutional provision that officers may be impeached or removed in such manner as may be prescribed by law.
3. The determination of the Legislature in abolishing an office and creating a new one that the change of duties or burdens is sufficient to make the latter a different office cannot be reviewed by courts provided the Act is otherwise valid.
4. The power to appoint a state supervisor of oil inspection may be conferred upon the state geologist by the Legislature under Const., art. 15, § 1, authorizing appointments to offices not otherwise provided for in that Constitution to be made as "prescribed by law."

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in an action brought to determine defendant's right to the office of state supervisor of oil inspection. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. J. Beveredge, D. H. Chase, DeWitt C. Justice, J. W. Vesey, O. H. Bogue, A. L. Brick, J. G. Engle, Bear & Bear and Faris & Hamill for appellant.

Messrs. J. E. McCullough, L. P. Harlan and A. G. Smith for appellee.

Coffey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case, as they are disclosed 18 L. R. A.

by the information, are that on the 8th day of November, 1889, the relator was appointed to the office of State Inspector of Oils for the State of Indiana by the governor, and was duly commissioned to hold his office for the period of two years from that date. He qualified on the 11th day of the same month, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and has ever since continued to discharge such duties. On the 13th day of March, 1891, the governor appointed the relator to the office of state supervisor of oil inspection for this State, and issued to him a commission to serve for the period of four years from that date, and on the 24th day of the same month, he qualified as such officer. In the month of March, 1891, whether before or after the appointment of the relator does not appear, Sylvester S. Gorby, the state geologist, appointed the appellee to the office of state supervisor of oil inspection, under the terms of an Act of the General Assembly passed in 1891. Under this appointment the appellee qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of said office. No commission was issued by the governor to the appellee, nor does it appear that the commission last above mentioned issued to the relator was attested by the secretary of state, or that the seal of the State was thereto attached.

This action was commenced by the appellant in the Marion Circuit Court to determine the right to the office; and to an information setting forth the above facts the court sustained a demurrer. The propriety of this ruling presents the question for our consideration.

The last session of the General Assembly passed an Act containing the following title: "An Act Creating the Office of State Supervisor of Oil Inspection, Prescribing the Duties thereof, Providing for the Appointment of such Supervisor, Abolishing the Office of Chief of the Division of Mineral Oils and State Inspector of Oils, Repealing all Laws Inconsistent therewith and Declaring an Emergency."

The Act creates the office of state supervisor of oil inspection, and provides that immediately upon the taking effect of the Act, the state geologist shall appoint a skilled and suitable person, a resident of the State, not interested in any way in manufacturing, dealing or vending any illuminating oils manufactured from petroleum, as state supervisor of oil inspection, whose term of office shall be for the term of four years from the date of his appointment. In case of a vacancy at any time, the Act requires the state geologist to fill the same. The State supervisor of oil inspection is subject to removal at any time by the state geologist for any neglect or violation of duty enjoined by law. The Act requires the supervisor to appoint deputies, and provides that he and his deputies shall in all respects perform the duties heretofore required by law of the chief of division of mineral oils and his assistants, or state inspector of oils and his deputies; and that they shall receive therefor the same fees and compensation provided by law for the chief of the division of mineral oils and his assistants, or state inspector of oils and his deputies. The state supervisor is required to make a report to the state geologist on the second Monday of January in each year of the inspections made by him and his deputies during the preceding year. He and his deputies are required to comply with the law in force pertaining to the inspection of oils.

The second section of the Act reads as follows: "The office of state inspector of oils as created by section 2 of 'an Act providing for the inspection of all kinds of oil that shall be used for illuminating or combusive purposes, regulating the sale of such oils, providing for certain appointments and removals to be made by the governor, defining what shall constitute certain misdemeanors, prescribing penalties, repealing certain laws and containing other matters properly connected therewith,' approved April 11, 1881, as well as the office of chief of the division of mineral oils, created by section 6 of 'An Act establishing a department of geology and natural resources of the State of Indiana and providing for a director of the department; abolishing the department of geology and natural history and the office of state geologist connected therewith; abolishing the offices of mine inspector and state inspector of oils; repealing all laws or parts of laws conflicting with any of the provisions of this Act, and declaring an emergency;' passed over the governor's veto, and in force February 26, 1889, are hereby abolished; and all the duties and requirements now and heretofore devolved by law upon such officers shall be performed by the state supervisor of oil inspection."

The Act repeals all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with its provisions and contains an emergency clause.

It is contended by the appellant that this Act is unconstitutional for the reasons:

First. That the same is in conflict with the provisions of § 19, art. 4, of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "Every Act shall embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith; which subject shall be expressed in the title."

Second. That the General Assembly has no 18 L. R. A.

power, under the Constitution, to confer on the state geologist the right to appoint to the office in controversy.

Third. That the Act is in conflict with the provisions of § 8, art. 6, of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "All state, county, township and town officers may be impeached, or removed from office, in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

The construction to be placed upon § 19, art. 4, supra, we regard as settled by the ably written opinion in the carefully considered case of Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28. Expressing regrets that the cases upon the subject of the construction of this constitutional provision were in conflict, the court, after a careful review of the cases, reached the conclusion that the mischiefs intended to be prevented by this section were two, namely:

"First. The passage of any Act under a false and delusive title which did not indicate the subject matter contained in the Act; a trick by which members of the Legislature had been deceived into the support of measures in ignorance of their true character.

"Second. The combining together in one Act of two or more subjects having no relation to each other; a method by which members, in order to procure such legislation as they wished, were often constrained to support and pass other measures obnoxious to them, and possessing no intrinsic merit."

The same ruling was made in the case of Farbach v. State, 24 Ind. 77.

Had the General Assembly passed a separate Act entitled "An Act Abolishing the Office of Chief of the Division of Mineral Oils and State Inspector of Oils," containing the provisions found in the Act before us, no one would doubt that the office previously held by the appellant was abolished, and that the title was sufficiently broad to cover the Act. So, if it had passed a separate Act entitled: "An Act Creating the Office of State Supervisor of Oil Inspection, Prescribing the Duties thereof, Providing for the Appointment of such Supervisor," followed by the provisions upon that subject found in the Act before us, it could not be doubted that a new office had been created, the mode of his selection prescribed and his duties fixed, and that the title of such Act was sufficient. Indeed, we do not understand the counsel for appellant as contending that the Act in question is not covered by the title, but the contention is that the Act does not, in fact, do what it purports to do. The argument is that an office consists of duties to be performed, services to be rendered, directions to be followed and emoluments to be received, and not in a name; and that, for this reason, the Act does not abolish one office and create another.

Many definitions of an office are set out in the able brief filed on behalf of the appellant; but we deem it unnecessary to set them out or to analyze them in this opinion; for, assuming that the essence of an office consists of duties to be performed, services to be rendered, directions to be followed and emoluments to be received, we do not think it follows that the General Assembly, by the Act under consideration, did not abolish one office and create another. In considering statutes it is our duty to ascertain, if possible, the intention of the legislative body; and when that intention is ascertained, it is our duty to enforce it, unless it violates some provision of the Constitution. The case of State v. Wiltz, 11 La. Ann. 439, is not in point here, for in that case it was expressly held by the court that the Legislature did not intend to abolish one office and create another and the decision turns upon the question of the legislative intent. Here there is no doubt as to the intention of the Legislature. As we understand the brief for the appellant, it is conceded that it was the intention to vacate the office held by the appellant with a view of making a place for some other person, and this the Legislature undertook to do by abolishing the office held by the appellant and creating one to be filled by an appointment made by the state geologist. This, we think, was the plain intention; and this, we think, the Legislature has done, unless there is some provision in our Constitution which prohibits such legislation. It is perfectly plain, we think, that there is now no office known as the chief of division of oil inspection; nor is there any office known by the name of the state inspector of oils; but it is equally as plain that there is an office known as the office of state supervisor of oil inspection.

Offices are neither grants nor contracts, nor obligations which cannot be changed or impaired. They are subject to the legislative will at all times, except so far as the Constitution may protect them from interference. Coffin v. State, 7 Ind. 157.

"Offices created by the Legislature may be abolished by the Legislature. The power that creates can destroy. The creator is greater than the creature. The term of an office may be shortened; the duties of the office increased and the compensation lessened by the legislative will." Gilbert v. Board of Comrs. 8 Blackf. 81; Ellis v. State, 4 Ind. 1; Walker v. Dunham, 17 Ind. 483; Walker v. Peelle, 18 Ind. 264; Jeffries v. Rowe, 63 Ind. 592.

In the case of Walker v. Peelle, supra, the term of Mr. Walker as state printer had been shortened by an Act of the Legislature. His second point in the case was that the Legislature did not possess the power to shorten his term of office, and upon this subject the court said: "Upon the second point, as to the power of the Legislature to make such enactments, we do not propose to spend much time. We suppose, as the office was created by that body, that it is, in this particular, under its control."

The power of the Legislature to shorten the term of a statutory office, so as to affect an incumbent, once conceded, it is not difficult to see that there is no limit to such power. If it may shorten the term of a three years' office to two years, it may fix the term at one year or at one hour. In other words, the length of time a particular person shall hold is absolutely within the discretion of the Legislature.

It is not claimed that there is any constitutional provision restraining the Legislature in this matter, except § 8, art. 6, above set out. In our opinion, it is not the purpose of this section to control legislative action upon the subject we are now considering. It was no doubt foreseen by the constitutional convention that some officer of the kind named might prove unfaithful to his trust, and the purpose of this provision was, we think, to enable the Legislature to pass such laws as would authorize his removal, by legal process, whether such office was created by statute or by the Constitution then under consideration. The effect of the Act we are now considering was to put an end to the appellant's term of office and to provide a new mode of selecting someone to discharge, at least some, if not all, of the duties theretofore discharged by the appellant; and that, too, whether the office of state supervisor of oil inspection is to be regarded as a new office or an old office under a new name. The intention to produce this result is plain, both from the title of the Act and from its provisions. In order to end the appellant's term of office, we do not think it was necessary to abolish the office held by him. As it is a statutory office, it was within the power of the Legislature to end the term of the incumbent at any time, and make provision for the selection of a successor.

But we think the appellant is in error in his position that the office of supervisor of oil inspection is an old office under a new name. We think it is in fact what it purports to be, a new office. It is true that the general duties to be performed by the incumbent of this office are the same as those performed by the appellant, but it cannot be said that no new duty is imposed. The imposition of public duties, to be compensated by emoluments received by the person performing such duties, generally constitutes a public office; but it is not true that a public office may not exist without the imposition of duties or the receipt of emoluments, as plainly appears by reading the Constitution, the provisions of which we are now considering. No duties are prescribed or emoluments fixed as to many of the offices made in the Constitution; but it cannot be said that, for this reason, the constitutional convention failed to create the office, or that the Legislature could, by a repeal of the Statutes since passed, fixing the duties and emoluments, abolish the offices created by the Constitution, to which no duties are attached or emoluments fixed by that instrument.

The term of office in this case is changed from two to four years; the mode of selection is changed and the incumbent is subject to removal at the will of the state geologist. As to the number of new duties to be performed or new burdens imposed which would be necessary to make a new office, we do not deem it necessary to inquire, as the Legislature has determined that those imposed in this case are sufficient for that purpose. With that determination we have no right or power to interfere, provided the Act is otherwise valid.

And this brings us to a consideration of the question as to whether the General Assembly may confer upon the state geologist the power to fill the office in question by appointment. It is earnestly contended by the appellant that the General Assembly possesses no such power, and in support of his contention he relies principally upon the case of State v. Hyde, 121 Ind. 20. That was an action commenced by the State, ex rel. Yancey, against Hyde to determine the right to the office of chief of the division of mineral oils. Each of the parties claimed the office under an appointment made by the director of the department of geology and natural resources of the State of Indiana. Mr. Collett, from whom Yancey received his appointment, had been appointed and commissioned by the governor, while Mr. Gorby, from whom Hyde received his appointment, had been elected by the General Assembly. The question at issue was as to which, if either, of the two claimants was entitled to the office. This incidentally involved the question of the power of the General Assembly to create and fill, by its own election, the office of director of the department of geology and natural resources; and the question of the power of that officer to appoint the chief of the division of mineral oils. It was held, first, that the General Assembly did not possess the power, under our Constitution, to create and fill, by its own election, the office of director of the department of geology and natural resources, and second, that such officer had no power to fill, by appointment, the office of chief of the division of mineral oils.

Whatever difference of opinion existed among the members of the court, as then constituted, as to the power of the General Assembly to create and fill an office in nowise connected with its legislative duties, there was no division of opinion as to the unconstitutionality of so much of the law then under consideration as attempted to confer on the director of the department of geology and natural resources the power to appoint the chief of the division of mineral oils. The reasons for holding this provision unconstitutional were fully set forth in the dissenting opinion filed at the time by Elliott, Ch. J.

The conclusion reached that there was no valid Act of the Legislature attempting to confer on the director of the department of geology and natural resources the power to appoint the chief of division of mineral oils, it must be plain to everyone that the question as to whether the Legislature could or could not confer such power was not involved in the case. The conclusion that the power to fill the office then in controversy resided in the governor was correct, whether § 5152, Rev. Stat. 1881, was to be regarded as in force, or whether it was to be regarded as having been repealed by subsequent legislation; for, if in force, it expressly conferred such power on the governor; and if repealed, there was an absence of statutory provisions upon the subject, and it became the duty of the governor to fill the office under his constitutional duty to see that the laws were faithfully executed. The laws upon the subject of inspecting oils could not be executed without an officer to execute them; and if the office was vacant, it was the duty of the governor, in the absence of some other mode prescribed by law, to fill it by appointment. As to whether the argument of the learned judge who wrote the opinion in the case of State v. Hyde is sound or otherwise, we do not stop to inquire, for the reason that the conclusion reached, holding that the power to appoint to the office then in controversy belonged to the governor, was so clearly right that the process of reasoning by which the conclusion was reached is wholly immaterial. The argument of the judge who writes an opinion is never to be confounded with the principle of law decided by the court.

In the later case of State v. Gorby, 122 Ind. 17, Mr. Gorby claimed the office of director of the department of geology and natural resources by virtue of an election by the General Assembly, while Mr. Collett claimed the same office under an appointment made by the governor of the State. The case involved the question as to whether the General Assembly of the State had the power, under our Constitution, to create an office in nowise connected with its legislative duties, and reserve to itself the right to fill such office by its own election. It was sought by Mr. Gorby to sustain the action of the General Assembly under the provisions of § 1, art. 15, of our State Constitution, which reads as follows: "All officers whose appointments are not otherwise provided for in this Constitution shall be chosen in such manner as now is, or hereafter may be, prescribed by law." It was held that this provision conferred upon the General Assembly the power to provide the manner in which certain state officers might be chosen, but that there was a broad distinction between providing the manner in which an officer might be chosen and in making the choice. In reaching this conclusion, the court relied, in some degree, upon the case of State v. Kennon, 7 Ohio St. 546, in which it is said that the distinction between the power to direct the manner, the mode of doing an act and doing the act itself, is almost too clear to admit of demonstration. Assuming that the office then in question was an administrative state office, the incumbent of which was charged with the duty of administering a department of the state government, it was further held that such incumbent, under our Constitution, should be elected by the people, and that it was the duty of the governor of the State to fill such office by appointment until an election could be held. Having reached this conclusion, it was, perhaps, unnecessary to a decision of the cause that anything more should have been said; but it was thought necessary to a proper understanding of the opinion delivered that some of the officers contemplated by that section of the Constitution should be named. In that case it was said by the court, in relation to offices of the nature of the one now under consideration: "In the creation of these and kindred offices, it is within the power of the General Assembly to provide by law that such offices may be filled either by election or by appointment, and when to be filled by appointment it need not provide that such appointment shall be made by the governor. Such appointments, if the law so provides, could doubtless be made by the governor of the State, or by anyone or more of the administrative state officers." What was said of officers other than the one involved in the case, being beyond the actual controversy between the parties to the suit, was, of course, of no binding force; but it is of value, as it tends to index the mind of the court, in a matter illustrative of the actual adjudication. In this case, however, we are met squarely with the question as to whether the General Assembly possesses the power to confer on the state geologist the legal right to appoint to the office involved in this suit. If it possesses such power, the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed; otherwise, it must be reversed.

The solution of the question presented for decision depends upon the nature of the office, and the construction to be placed upon this provision of our State Constitution.

The office is not an administrative state office, whose incumbent is charged with the administration of a separate department of the state government. The duties to be performed are such as pertain purely to the police. It is an office, therefore, which may be filled by appointment, and as the appointment of the incumbent is not provided for in the Constitution, the case falls clearly within the provisions of § 1, art. 15. That section applies to such officers only as may be appointed, and for whose appointment no provision is made in the Constitution. As the incumbent to the office in question may be appointed, and as no provision is made in the Constitution for his appointment, the General Assembly has the power to provide, by law, for the manner of his selection. It has the power to provide that such office shall be filled by popular election, or that it shall be filled by appointment. While the appointment to office is generally the exercise of an executive or administrative function, we do not think it must, of necessity, be made by the chief executive; for, by the terms of § 1, art. 8, of the Constitution, the executive department of the State includes the administrative. Of course, it was not the intention that any administrative state officer should perform any duty properly and necessarily belonging to the governor of the State; but it was, we think, the intention that such officers should have the power to perform such duties as should be required of them by law, in the administration of the state government, where such requirement in nowise conflicted with the powers delegated to the governor alone.

The appointment to office being generally the exercise of an executive or administrative function, the power must be conferred upon some executive or administrative officer; but the state geologist is an administrative state officer elected by the people. The appointment to the office in controversy here by the state geologist is certainly a manner or mode of selecting an officer for whose appointment no provision is made by our Constitution. Nor does such mode of selection in any manner infringe upon the prerogatives of the governor of the State. There are many appointments conferred by the Constitution upon the governor which can in no manner be affected by legislation. The rule upon that subject is stated by Judge Cooley in his valuable work on Constitutional Limitations as follows: "The authority that makes the laws has large discretion in determining the means through which they shall be executed, and the performance of many duties which they may provide for by law they may refer either to the chief executive of the State, or, at their option, to any other executive or ministerial officer, or even to a person specially designated for the duty. What can be definitely said on this subject is this: that such powers as are specially conferred by the Constitution upon the governor, or upon any other specified officer, the Legislature cannot require or authorize to be performed by any other officer or authority; and from those duties which the Constitution requires of him he cannot be excused by law. But other powers or duties the executive cannot exercise or assume except by legislative authority; and the power which in its discretion it confers, it may also, in its discretion, withhold, or confide to other hands." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 133.

The office involved in this controversy does not belong to the class which must of necessity be filled by the governor; but it is an office created by statute, largely under the control of the Legislature which created it, and falls within the constitutional provision which confers upon the General Assembly the power to prescribe the mode or manner of selecting its incumbent.

In our opinion, the Statute now under consideration is not subject to the constitutional objections urged against it, and for that reason, the circuit court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the information in this cause.

Judgment affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain bonds alleged to have been delivered by plaintiff's intestate during her lifetime to defendant for safe keeping and by him retained. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinions.

Mr. F. A. Baker, with Messrs. Cutcheon, Stellwagen & Fleming, for appellant :

In applying statutes like the one under consideration in this case, courts should and do regard not the nominal parties but the real parties, whose interests are involved in the issue.

See Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795; Duryea v. Granger's Estate, 10 West. Rep. 568, 66 Mich. 593; Bichelder v. Brown, 47 Mich. 366; Youngs v. Cunningham, 57 Mich. 154, 155; Mundy v. Foster, 81 Mich. 321; Downey v. Andrews, 84 Mich. 72; Wood v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 84 Mich. 521.

An executor against whom, personally, an action is brought for property which he has accounted for as executor, can raise the same questions by way of defense that could have been raised by or for the estate had the suit been brought against him as executor.

While this suit is in form against Jerome Croul, it is in effect against the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased. If the real defendant and the opposite party within the meaning of the Statute is the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased, then the executor, not being an heir or legatee, is a competent witness as to such matters.

Mr. William H. Wells for appellee.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I am satisfied that the defendant, Jerome Croul, was a competent witness in this case. It was admitted upon the argument by plaintiff's counsel, as it conclusively appears from the record, that the defendant had not converted the bonds in question in this suit to his own individual use; that he took possession of them for the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased, and has always held them for said estate. It appears that on his first step as executor of Chauncey Hurlbut's estate he inventoried these bonds as the property of such estate, and has ever since accounted to the Probate Court of Wayne County for them and the interest accruing upon them. There is no disguising the issue in this suit. It is really a contest between the estates of Philinda and Chauncey Hurlbut for the ownership of these bonds. With such contest Jerome Croul has no concern, save as executor of the latter estate; and he has and claims to have no personal interest in the subject matter of the suit. This is admitted by the counsel for plaintiff, and yet it is gravely asserted as a matter of law that the plaintiff has a right, by planting his action against Croul individually, not only to apparently change the whole outward face of the contest, but to so shape the conduct and issue upon the trial as to shut out the testimony of Croul as an "opposite party," and, as a consequence thereof, to recover a large sum of money from him personally out of a transaction in which it is admitted he acted as executor, and not for himself, and which he is not allowed to explain, though fraud is charged against him as such executor. There is no excuse for this course, because by the action of Croul the bonds or their proceeds have not been lost to plaintiff's intestate or her heirs. The estate of Chauncey Hurlbut is amply sufficient to pay the judgment in this case twice over.

When we come to examine the question whether or not Mrs. Williams was a competent witness for the plaintiff, it will be plainly apparent why this suit was planted against Jerome Croul individually, and not against him as executor. By making him individually the party defendant the plaintiff has succeeded, under the interpretation of the Statute, to which I shall soon refer, by the court below, in proving his case by the principal heir of Mrs. Hurlbut, and closed the mouth of Croul against denial of her story. If this is a correct construction of the Statute, then it is capable of being made the instrument of the most outrageous injustice, when its enactment was intended to prevent fraud and injustice; and it opens a way by which the estates of deceased persons may be more easily robbed than if no such statute existed; and that, too, by the testimony of those whom the Statute intended to debar from giving evidence in their own behalf of facts equally within the knowledge of the deceased. The Statute, as it now exists, having been frequently amended since its first enactment, reads as follows: "When a suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees or personal representatives of a deceased person, the opposite party, if examined as a witness on his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of such deceased person: . . . provided, that whenever the words 'the opposite party' occur in this section it shall be deemed to include the assignors or assignees of the claim, or any part thereof, in controversy." Pub. Acts 1885, pp. 156, 157. It is evident that this Statute is intended to reach the real party in interest, and not a mere nominal party, who is not interested in the result of the allowance or disallowance of the claim against the estate of a deceased person, except as it becomes his duty as executor or administrator to prosecute or defend a suit in which the estate is interested. The proviso was attached in 1885, no doubt, for the express purpose of preventing the practice which prevailed under the Statute before such amendment of assigning the claim against the estate of a deceased person, and then the assignor being sworn as a witness to prove it. The proviso not only cuts off this method of evading it, but also goes further, and also prohibits the assignee from testifying who, in the absence of a fraudulent intent to evade the law in taking the assignment, would be the person to be benefited by the allowance of the claim. It will thus be seen that the Legislature intended not only that the party owning the claims should not be permitted to testify to the matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased person, but also to prevent any evasion of the Statute. It was in this view of the Statute that we held in Duryea v. Granger's Estate, 66 Mich. 593, 10 West. Rep. 568, that an administratrix, if not interested in the estate as heir or otherwise, was not the "opposite party" mentioned in the statute, and against whom its prohibition runs,—citing the fact that in Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795, the administratrix was held within the Statute, for the reason that she was also an heir to the estate of her intestate. It was said in Duryea v.

Granger's Estate that the suit might well have been entitled "The Estate of Joseph Granger, Deceased, v. The Estate of Edward Granger, Deceased." And in this case now under consideration it might well be entitled "The Estate of Philinda Hurlbut, Deceased, v. The Estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, Deceased." as the real controversy is without doubt between these two estates. And while it is necessary that these two estates should be represented by the respective executors as nominal parties, that persons may be before the court, the real contest is none the less between the estates of the deceased persons, in which the executors have no personal interest, and are affected only as they represent the estate. Notice also the language of the Statute, "the opposite party, if examined as a witness on his own behalf," clearly indicating that he is not to be permitted to testify "in his own behalf"—in other words, in his own interest—as against one whose lips are closed by death. In the suit which we are considering, the claim against the defendant was established by the testimony of Mary Ann Williams, who was a niece and heir of Philinda Hurlbut, and Margaret Williams, a daughter of Mary Ann Williams. It appeared clearly from their evidence, before the plaintiff closed his case, that Croul took possession of the bonds and held them as the executor of Chauncey Hurlbut's estate. Margaret Williams testified that Mrs. Hurlbut called for her bonds, and wanted Croul to bring them back to her. That Croul put her off for a while, and then said: "Those bonds were never calculated for you. They belong to Chauncey Hurlbut's estate;" and that she could not prove that they belonged to her. It was not claimed by any of plaintiff's witnesses that Croul was trying to get any personal benefit from these bonds; and it was apparent when the plaintiff rested, that Croul was not the real defendant, but only nominally so, because he had been sued in his individual name; that the real defendant was the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut. The defense then showed the proceedings in the probate court,—the filing of the inventory by Croul, in which these bonds were placed as the property of Chauncey Hurlbut's estate; and Jerome Croul's accounts as executor, in which he accounted to said estate for the interest upon the bonds. It was also shown that there had been no distribution of the assets of the estate, and that Philinda Hurlbut, in her lifetime, and October 1, 1885, gave him the following receipt for the interest upon the bonds, by such receipt recognizing that he held them as executor of her husband's estate: "Received, Detroit, October 1, 1885, from Jerome Croul, 40 coupons of $10 each, $400, cut from four per cent U. S. bonds belonging to the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased. Philinda Hurlbut." But when Mr. Croul attempted to state the conversation with Mrs. Hurlbut by which he became possessed of the bonds, or any material circumstance connected with his possession or holding the same, equally within the knowledge of Mrs. Hurlbut, he was prevented from testifying, under the ruling of the court that he was the "opposite party" mentioned in and intended by the Statute, and therefore incompetent to give evidence of any fact equally within the knowledge of plaintiff's intestate. The ruling of the court was erroneous.

Another important question arises in the case: Was Mary Ann Williams a competent witness on behalf of the plaintiff to any facts equally within the knowledge of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased? She is an heir of Philinda Hurlbut, and, as such, interested in the result of the suit. The nominal plaintiff is the administrator of Mrs. Hurlbut's estate, but Mrs. Williams is one of the real parties to the litigation. I think she comes clearly within the intent of the Statute. This suit, as heretofore shown, is really a controversy between two estates. Neither Penny, the administrator of Mrs. Hurlbut, nor Jerome Croul, who is defending as the executor of Chauncey Hurlbut, can be said to be an "opposite party." The real parties are the opposite parties, and Mrs. Williams is one of them. The case of Wright v. Wilson, 17 Mich. 192, referred to in the brief of plaintiff's counsel, does not touch this case; and Pendill v. Neuberger, 64 Mich. 220, 12 West. Rep. 47, also cited to sustain the competency of Mrs. Williams as a witness, is not applicable. In the last case, a son and heir-at-law of a deceased party was held not disqualified to testify to a conversation between his deceased father and the defendant. The defendant was living. Had he been dead, and the suit being defended by his executor or administrator, the case would be in point. As it is, it has no relevancy to the issue here. I do not deem it necessary to cite adjudications from other States. This is a question depending upon our own Statutes, and I think has been settled by our own court. In Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795, and Duryea v. Granger's Estate, 66 Mich. 593, 10 West. Rep. 568, the reasoning of the opinions would preclude Mrs. Williams from testifying to facts equally within the knowledge of Chauncey Hurlbut, upon the ground that she is an "opposite party" as against his estate. In the first case the testimony of Mrs. Howard was rejected. She was an heir of the estate, as well as administratrix. The question was mooted whether Mrs. Evans, a sister of Mrs. Howard, and equally with her an heir-at-law of her father, was a competent witness under the Statute. It was passed, however, without decision, because it was shown that Mrs. Evans had assigned her interest in the claim, and had no interest in the result of the suit. This was before the amendment precluding an assignor from giving evidence. In Bachelor v. Brown, 47 Mich. 366, the real party, who was defending the suit, brought by an executor upon a promissory note, was held to be the real party in interest, and therefore the "opposite party" of the Statute, within its meaning and intent, although he did not appear upon the record as a party to the suit.

In keeping with this principle, that the court should look at the real and not the nominal parties in a cause, is the case of Wood v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 84 Mich. 521, where the question to be considered was an amendment changing the names of parties to a suit. It was there held that the heirs were the real parties to be benefited by the litigation, and that therefore the substitution of the names of such heirs for the name of the administrator was admissible. It was also held in Youngs v. Cunningham, 57 Mich. 153, Mr. Justice Champin writing the opinion, which was concurred in by all the members of the court, that B. F. Cunningham, although not a party to the record, was not a competent witness to testify to facts equally within the knowledge of George Cunningham, deceased, whose wife and children were defending in ejectment, because B. F. Cunningham had executed to the plaintiff, Youngs, a warranty deed of the land in question. The court said: "He was under covenant to sustain the title, and the suit was in effect his suit to try the title to the land. If not within the express letter, he comes within the meaning of the Statute, and is precluded thereby from testifying to facts equally within the knowledge of the deceased." In Mundy v. Foster, 31 Mich. 321, in a suit in chancery by a husband to have a trust deed of his deceased wife declared void, and in which the trustees named in such deed were the party defendants, in speaking of the husband's evidence the court said: "When he assumed to testify to the verbal agreement [with his wife], his possession, if not literally within the terms of the Statute against admitting a surviving party to a transaction to testify in certain cases (Comp. Laws 1871, § 5968), was clearly within its policy; and in my judgment he was not a proper witness to prove the making of the contract." It will be noticed that the Statute since then has been broadened and made more far-reaching by amendments, all of which amendments have been on the road to reach the real parties in interest, and to preclude them from testifying to facts equally within the knowledge of the dead person, whose estate is sought to be depleted by such testimony in the interest of the party offering it. The court erred in permitting Mary Ann Williams, an heir-at-law of Mrs. Hurlbut, to give evidence of conversations between Chauncey Hurlbut and his wife, and between said Hurlbut and the witness.

It is argued that the plaintiff had a right to plant this suit against Jerome Croul individually; that the action is one of bailment, and that it is doubtful if Croul could dispute the title of his bailor; but in any event the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut could not be bound by the result of this suit. The right to plant this suit against Jerome Croul individually may be conceded, but the right to maintain it depends upon the facts and circumstances proven in the case. In our opinion, it must be conceded that Jerome Croul had the right to show that he received these bonds of Philinda Hurlbut, of her own free will and consent, and on the understanding that he received them by virtue of his being appointed one of the executors under the will of Chauncey Hurlbut, and as the property of said estate; and that he has the right to come in and defend as such executor, and to maintain and prove by competent testimony that the bonds never belonged to Philinda Hurlbut or her estate, but have ever been, and now are, the property of Chauncey Hurlbut and belong to his estate,—and the estate will be bound in such case by the result of the litigation. In Hillman v. Schwenk, 68 Mich. 297, 12 West. Rep. 661, and Hillman v. Schwenk, 68 Mich. 301, a similar case, the executor of an estate was permitted to indemnify the defendant and assume the defense of a suit brought upon a promissory note; and it was held by so doing the estate would be bound by the result; and, further, that in such case the plaintiff would be precluded from testifying to facts equally within the knowledge of the deceased, although the maker of the note was the person sued and the defendant of record. The issue in those cases was similar to the issue in this. The plaintiff claimed to have obtained the note from the testator by purchase before his death. The executor defended upon the ground that there was no such purchase. Here the claim to the bonds is that they were a gift. The executor's defense is that there was no gift. In the Hillman v. Schwenk Cases the defendants had no interest in the result except to pay the note to whom it might be found to belong; and in this case Jerome Croul individually has and claims no interest in these bonds. His only concern is to account to the owner of them. The defense that he is making is the defense of Jerome Croul as executor, which it would have been his duty to have made had the bonds been in the hands of a third person and such third person had been made a defendant in this suit instead of Croul. He could have stepped in, had the third person been sued, and defended as the executor of Chauncey Hurlbut, under the authority of Hillman v. Schwenk, and under every principle of law and justice; and we know of no reason why he cannot equally and as well defend as executor in case the suit is planted against him individually, instead of being brought against another, when the issue is the same, to wit: Do the bonds belong to the estate of Philinda Hurlbut, or to the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut?

The judgment of the court below must be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs of this court to defendant.

Long and Grant, JJ., concur with Morse, J.

Champlin, Ch. J., dissenting:

The plaintiff is the administrator of the estate of Philinda Hurlbut, deceased, and as such brought this suit in assumpsit against the defendant to recover the value of forty United States government bonds, which plaintiff claims the deceased in her lifetime placed in defendant's hands for safe-keeping, to be redelivered to her on demand; and that she demanded them and he refused to deliver them to her, but claimed that they were the property of the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased, of which he was executor. Chauncey Hurlbut, at and prior to July 4, 1885, was the owner of the bonds in question. He had in 1879 made a will, which was, after his decease, admitted to probate, in which he gave his wife his horses, carriages, household furniture, and $10,000 absolutely, and the income of the estate for her life. After her death a few small bequests were to be paid, and the residue of the estate went to trustees for the perpetual benefit of the Detroit Water-Works. Penny v. Croul, 76 Mich. 471, 5 L. R. A. 858.

Chauncey Hurlbut died September 9, 1885, 13 L. R. A.

and his will was admitted to probate October 18, 1885. He left Philinda Hurlbut, his wife, surviving him, and no child. Jerome Croul and Philinda Hurlbut were appointed executors, and they qualified; but Philinda Hurlbut never took any part in the execution of the trusts of the will, or in the administration of the estate. She died October 4, 1886, intestate, and the plaintiff in this suit was appointed administrator of her estate. Mrs. Hurlbut had no children. Her father and mother died before she did. Mary Ann Williams is her sister, and Margaret Williams is a daughter of Mary Ann. It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff that Chauncey Hurlbut, on the 4th day of July, 1885, gave to his wife, Philinda, forty United States government bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, and accompanied the gift by immediate personal delivery, in the presence of Mary A. Williams and Margaret Williams; and upon the trial of this cause the plaintiff introduced testimony to establish such gift inter vivos. One of the witnesses produced to establish the facts upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery is Mrs. Mary Ann Williams; and her competency to testify in the cause under the Statute presently mentioned is challenged by defendant. The plaintiff also claims that after Mr. Hurlbut's death the defendant, Croul, was at the house of the widow, and was informed by her of the gift to her of the aforesaid bonds, and that defendant, Croul, represented that it was very dangerous to keep such bonds in the house,—that there was danger of their being murdered,—and offered to take care of the bonds by placing them in a safe, and promised, if Mrs. Hurlbut would do so, that she might cut off the coupons, and that he would deliver them to her whenever she demanded them; and thereupon she delivered them to him for safe-keeping. The exact date at which this occurred is not given by the plaintiff's witnesses. Margaret Williams testified that it was after the probate of the will. Mrs. Williams also thinks it was after the will was proved, but is not certain that it was not before. Mr. Jerome Croul testified that he received the bonds in suit on the 14th day of September, 1885, as the property of Chauncey Hurlbut, and that he had always held them as the property of Chauncey Hurlbut; that they were received by him from Mrs. Hurlbut, in the presence of John Lund. The witness Alexander McArthur testified in behalf of the plaintiff that he had a conversation with the defendant about four months after the funeral of Chauncey Hurlbut, in which Croul said that "he had got forty thousand dollars in bonds of the old lady; and I asked him how he done that, and he said, 'I got them for safe-keeping,' and that 'she never would smell of them again.'" Mr. Croul was sworn in his own behalf, and testified that Mr. Lund was present when he received the bonds from Mrs. Hurlbut; but Lund was not called to dispute or contradict the testimony given by plaintiff's witnesses as to what transpired on that occasion. The fact that October 1, 1885, Mrs. Hurlbut signed a receipt for $400 for the coupons in which Croul had inserted the statement, "Cut from four per cent U. S. bonds belonging to the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased," was not conclusive that those bonds belonged to the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut. If the bonds were Mrs. Hurlbut's individual property, she was entitled to the interest; and likewise was she entitled if they belonged to the estate, as the will gave her the whole income during her lifetime. The defendant was permitted to introduce any evidence which he had to show that the bonds belonged to the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut at the time of his death, and this receipt was competent testimony to be considered as tending to show that the bonds belonged in fact to the Hurlbut estate. Defendant, Croul, offered to testify fully to the interview with Mrs. Hurlbut when he received the bonds from her, but it was excluded under the Statute. It is error to suppose that, if Penny, as the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Hurlbut, had brought this action against Croul as executor of the last will of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased, he would have been a competent witness to testify to facts which, if true, were equally within the knowledge of the deceased, Mrs. Hurlbut. The Statute is not based upon the interest or disinterestedness of a party who seeks to testify as a witness, but upon the injustice and impropriety of permitting a party to an action with a representative of a deceased party testifying at all to matters within the knowledge of the deceased, whose executor or administrator has brought or is defending the suit. The mere fact that he is sued as executor would not permit him in a court of law to open his mouth to testify to facts which the other party could not testify to, because his mouth is sealed by death. The law never intended such an absurdity. If it had intended to make an exception in favor of the opposite party, who should chance to be appointed executor or administrator, it would have so declared. There is no more reason for repealing the plain provisions of the Statute by judicial fiat in favor of executors and administrators than there is in favor of any other disinterested parties; and the law makes no exception in favor of disinterested parties. While the Statute has been construed as embracing within its spirit the real as well as nominal parties to a suit, no well-considered case has made an exception of the parties to the record. This will be apparent from a review of our decisions upon that section of the Statute.

In the case of Downey v. Andrus, 43 Mich. 65, all the cases to that time were reviewed. In Eccard v. Brush, 48 Mich. 3, a suit against executors and trustees, held, that complainant could not testify to matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased. In Rayburn v. Mason Lumber Co., 57 Mich. 273, held, that the opposite party cannot be permitted to testify to matters equally within the knowledge of a deceased officer of the company sued, nor of a deceased partner in a suit against a partnership. In Foster v. Hill, 55 Mich. 540, the bill was filed by the widow and some of the heirs of a deceased person against another heir to set aside a deed executed by the deceased in his lifetime on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud and forgery. Held, that the parties were excluded from testifying as to matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased. In Schratz v. Schratz, 35 Mich. 485, it was held that the Statute applies where the knowledge which the deceased had was proved through letters passing between the parties; and it was held, further, that counsel had a right to cross-examine, to ascertain fully with reference to such matters testified to, which were equally within the knowledge of the deceased party, and might then move to strike out the whole of such testimony because incompetent under the Statute. The testimony elicited on cross-examination is the testimony given in behalf of the party calling the witness. In Brown v. Bell, 58 Mich. 68, it was held that this Statute did not apply to proceedings to probate a will on the ground that until the will was probated there was no representative of the deceased, and no one who could be called an opposite party to such representative. The same was held in Schofield v. Walker, 58 Mich. 96. In McClintock's App., 58 Mich. 155, it was held that proceedings upon distribution of the estates of deceased persons did not come within the section of the Statute, and that all the heirs might be compelled to testify; that it was in effect a suit between the distributees, who each represented his own interest. In McMillan v. Bissell, 63 Mich. 66, 5 West. Rep. 706, the bill was filed by the executors of the last will of Hugh Moffat, deceased, against the daughter and son-in-law of the deceased. The daughter was the residuary legatee of one share he had left, and the son-in-law was also a legatee, so far as the share should be applied to an indebtedness due from him to the estate. Held, that they could not testify to any fact equally within the knowledge of the deceased while living. In Stackable v. Stackable's Estate, 65 Mich. 515, 8 West. Rep. 812, it was held that a married woman, who had a husband living, who had boarded the deceased, was not entitled to the money due for board, and could not present it as a claim against the estate without an assignment from her husband; and that she was an assignee within this Statute, which precludes assignees from testifying to facts within the knowledge of the deceased party. In Ruffum v. Porter, 70 Mich. 623, 14 West. Rep. 896, the bill was brought against a purchaser from the heirs of a deceased person. Held, that he was not a competent witness. In Hillman v. Schwenk, 68 Mich. 293, 12 West. Rep. 661, held, that the testator's personal property vests in the executor for the purpose of administering the estate; and, where suit was brought upon a note which the defendant claimed belonged to the deceased party at his death, and the executor indemnified the defendant, and took upon himself the defense of the suit, the plaintiff was disqualified from testifying; and held, also, that legatees and devisees did not represent the estate in the prosecution or defense of suits. In Taylor v. Bunker, 68 Mich. 258, 12 West. Rep. 565, plaintiff brought suit against an administrator. Held, that the testimony was not rendered admissible by the fact that other parties were present and had knowledge of the matters testified to equally with the deceased. In Hood v. Olin, 68 Mich. 165, 12 West. Rep. 503, the plaintiff claimed title to certain property as mortgagee under a mortgage by one Nead, and brought a replevin against the firm of Ware & Olin. During the pendency of the suit Ware died. Held, that the statute did not prevent Nead from testifying to matters equally within the knowledge of Ware or the firm. Bassett v. Shepardson, 52 Mich. 5, announces the general doctrine. In Singer Mfg. Co. v. Benjamin, 55 Mich. 380, the action was replevin, brought against the defendant individually. Held, that defendant in replevin, under a plea of the general issue, could show that plaintiff had no right to possession when suit was commenced, and for this purpose could show that he was special administrator of a deceased person, who was the owner of goods at the time of his death; and, having shown that he defended in a representative capacity, a witness, who had been agent of the plaintiff corporation, was excluded from testifying to matters which, if true, were equally within the knowledge of the deceased, and which knowledge the witness acquired while he was agent. In Hillman v. Schwenk, 68 Mich. 297, 12 West. Rep. 661, held that, in a suit brought to recover upon a note made payable to a person since deceased, indorsed by said deceased in his lifetime, and which note it was claimed belonged to the deceased at the time of his death, and had been improperly obtained by the plaintiff, and where a legatee was assuming the defense, this fact did not prohibit the plaintiff from testifying as to matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased. In McCutcheon v. Loud, 71 Mich. 433, plaintiff made a contract with one Gay, who was trustee for a firm of which he was a member. Gay died. Held, that plaintiff could not testify to the contract made with Gay, as the suit was brought against and defended by the surviving partners. Lautenshlager v. Lautenshlager, 80 Mich. 290, 291, was a proceeding to probate what was claimed to be a will, and it was held that the statute did not apply to such proceedings. In Wilson v. Wilson's Estate, 80 Mich. 472, Eliza Wilson presented a claim before the commissioners on claims in the estate of Helen Wilson, deceased. Held, that a daughter of the claimant was a competent witness to testify to matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased. In Lake v. Nolan, 81 Mich. 115, it was held, in a controversy between an alleged grantee and a widow claiming her dower right, that the Statute did not apply. In Barker v. Hebbard, 81 Mich. 267, after the trial defendant died, and upon the second trial the plaintiff offered to introduce a stenographer's minutes of what plaintiff swore to on the first trial. Held, excluded by the Statute. Jackson v. Cole, 81 Mich. 440. This was not a suit wherein the representative of the decedent is a party to the record. Plaintiff sued defendant upon a claim against him, assigned to her by her husband in his lifetime. Held, that she was a competent witness to testify to the assignment. Lytle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 84 Mich. 298, held that testimony of a party is admissible as to matters equally within the knowledge of an agent of a corporation, since deceased, if such matters testified about were also within the knowledge of any surviving officer or agent of the corporation.

There certainly is nothing in these authorities to support the contention that Croul is a competent witness to testify to matters which were equally within the knowledge of Philinda Hurlbut, because he claims these bonds as an executor of the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased.

If this reasoning is to prevail, which is claimed by the defendant's counsel, we have a case prosecuted and defended by the representatives of deceased persons, where the Statute says the opposite party shall not be permitted to testify, and yet where they both can testify. The estate is not supposed to be in possession of facts about which it can speak, even if permitted to by the Statute. I always supposed that the estate of a deceased person is the property left by the person upon his death, and that the legal title to personal property vested in the executor or administrator, and that the person having the legal title to the property is the real party in interest. It is said that executors are merely agents of the estate, and not parties to the suit. If mere agents, and not parties, then death would have no effect to abate the suit; the party would be still before the court. But, as I read the Statute, an agent, though sued, is not exempt from the prohibition of the Statute. An agent may possess knowledge of facts which were equally within the knowledge of the deceased, and, if sued by a representative of the deceased as a party, he could hardly be permitted to testify to such matters by showing that he was an agent. Indeed, the deceased may have been his principal, and the suit may have arisen out of that relation. The case of Duryea v. Granger's Estate, 66 Mich. 599, 10 West. Rep. 568, is relied on to support the contention that Croul is a competent witness. The case was not reversed upon that ground. Two of the judges merely concurred in reversing, without assenting to the reasons given for the reversal. That was a case of a claim presented against the estate of a deceased party. This is not. Counsel for the defendant says in his brief that this "case may well be entitled 'The Estate of Philinda Hurlbut, Deceased, v. Estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, Deceased.'" There is no principle of pleading or practice which will authorize a cause to be so entitled, even if it had been against Jerome Croul, executor of the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased. Cases should be entitled with the names of the parties to the suit. In a suit brought by an executor or administrator, the administrator or executor is the party, and not the estate. The parties to the suit determine how the papers in the suit should be entitled, but the entitling never determines who are the parties. It would be a novel way to determine who is "the opposite party" under the Statute by entitling papers in the suit in any particular name. Would a declaration which commenced with "The Estate of Philinda Hurlbut, plaintiff in this suit, files this declaration against the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut in a plea of," etc., bring any parties before the court? Is there any rule of pleading heretofore discovered that would sanction such pleading? Yet, in order to evade the Statute, and build up a fictitious construction, the estate must be invested with an entity, and called a party to the suit, to let in the representatives of the deceased to testify, when the Statute plainly forbids it. Where the suit is between representatives of deceased parties the Statute prohibits both of those representatives from testifying; yet, under this construction, by a strange metamorphosis, both can testify simply by calling the suit one between two estates. Croul, as executor, is not a mere nominal or disinterested party. If the property belongs to him as executor, he is really the party possessed of the legal title. Does the Statute permit him, even if he is so invested with the legal title, and is seeking to defend it, to testify to facts which were in the knowledge of the deceased party, who, in her lifetime, claimed to own the property, and whose administrator is seeking to recover it for her, and whose title Croul is disputing?

Before proceeding to the determination of the competency of the witnesses, it is necessary to consider the character in which the parties to this suit stand before the court. It is claimed that the question of the competency of the witnesses should be considered as if the suit was instituted against Jerome Croul in his representative capacity as executor of the last will of Chauncey Hurlbut. But I do not accede to this proposition. According to his own testimony, he must have received these bonds in his individual capacity, before he was appointed executor, and before the will was admitted to probate. If the bonds were the property of Philinda Hurlbut, it can make no difference how he regarded them. It is possible that she might, after he had collected the avails from the United States, and turned them in to the estate, maintain an action for money had and received against him as executor, so as to be reimbursed out of the assets of the estate. De Valengin v. Duffy, 89 U. S. 14 Pet. 283, 10 L. ed. 457; Baring v. Putnam, 1 Holmes, 261; Conger v. Atwood, 28 Ohio St. 134. The general rule is that, where the executor does some act or makes some promise after the decease of the testator, he is chargeable in his individual capacity, and not as executor. The exception is limited to cases where the transaction which constituted the cause of action arose in the lifetime of the deceased. Such is not this case. The transaction which constitutes the cause of action here arose after the decease of Chauncey Hurlbut, and is based upon a contract of bailment between Jerome Croul and Philinda Hurlbut. As a general rule, a bailee cannot dispute the title of the bailor, but it is a defense to an action brought against him by the bailor for non-delivery of subject bailed that it was taken by or delivered to a person having paramount title and right of possession. In such case the burden of proof is upon the bailee. In this case Jerome Croul, the individual, and Jerome Croul, as executor of the last will of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased, are two distinct persons in the law. One represents Jerome Croul, the individual, and the other represents the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, deceased. It was just as competent for him to show in defense for not delivering these bonds that they belonged to him as executor, as it would have been to show, if such had been the fact, that they belonged to the Preston National Bank. Although that defense was open to him, and he was not shut out from it in this case, yet he, as executor, was no more a party to the suit than would the Preston National Bank have been had he sought to show that he had delivered the bonds to it on demand, and that it had the paramount title and right to the possession thereof. The important issue in the suit was, 18 L. R. A.

In whom was the paramount title? and this should be borne in mind in testing the competency of the witnesses to testify in this cause. The plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Philinda Hurlbut, claimed the paramount title, which was delivered through an executed gift of the bond by Chauncey Hurlbut to Philinda Hurlbut. The defendant claims that the paramount title was in the executor of the last will of Chauncey Hurlbut. Individually he made no claim to the bond, but denied his liability as bailee. Neither in this suit did the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut claim the bonds. Jerome Croul individually made the claim that he had delivered the bonds to the executor of Chauncey Hurlbut's estate. The Statute referred to reads as follows: "That when a suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees, or personal representatives of a deceased person, the opposite party, if examined as a witness on his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of such deceased person." 2 How. Stat. § 7545. This suit is prosecuted by plaintiff as the representative of Philinda Hurlbut, deceased, against Jerome Croul in his individual capacity; and, as he is the opposite party, he is excluded by the plain terms of the Statute. A judgment in this case will not bind the assets of the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut in the hands of the executor, and cannot be collected by the plaintiff out of such assets. He was therefore not a competent witness to testify to matters equally within the knowledge of Philinda Hurlbut. Yerkes v. Blodgett, 48 Mich. 211; Douney v. Andrus, 43 Mich. 65; Bassett v. Sheperdson, 52 Mich. 8.

Bachelor v. Brown, 47 Mich. 366, is cited as supporting the contention of the defendant. That case holds that where an executor brings suit upon negotiable paper, and a third person claims the paper, and takes upon himself the defense of the suit upon that ground, such third person is deemed an opposite party to the executor, and cannot testify to facts which, if true, must have been within the knowledge of the deceased. We adhere to the principle there asserted. It shows that, if it were true that the third party here, viz., Jerome Croul, as executor, and representing the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, claims the bonds, and has taken upon himself, as such executor, the defense of the suit, he is not a competent witness to testify to any facts which, if true, were equally within the knowledge of Mrs. Hurlbut. The mistake which it seems to me the counsel for the defendant make is the assumption that Jerome Croul is not the real party defendant, when in point of fact and law he is. As before stated, if he could have been made liable as executor (which is at least doubtful), the plaintiff having elected to proceed against him individually, he is bound by the election, and defendant must respond in damages, unless he, as an individual, can show he has delivered the bonds to a person who has a title paramount to that of the administrator. Mrs. Williams was a competent witness for the plaintiff. The suit was not defended by the personal representatives of a deceased party. This disposes of the errors assigned. The defendant was permitted to introduce any competent testimony tending to show that the bonds in question belonged to the estate of Chauncey Hurlbut, and also that he had always treated them as belonging to the estate; that he had included them in his inventory, and had accounted for both principal and interest to the estate. The estate is not yet closed, and if he has acted under a mistake of fact it is presumed it may be rectified. The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff must establish the fact claimed by him that the bonds in question were given by Mr. Hurlbut to his wife, Philinda Hurlbut, and delivered to her, by a preponderance of evidence, and that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff upon that issue; and in conclusion he said: "If you believe from all the evidence that these bonds, at the time Mr. Hurlbut died, were found in the house, and given to Mr. Croul after his death,—were not the property of Mrs. Hurlbut,—then your verdict will be for the defendant. If you find from the evidence that it was the property of Mrs. Hurlbut at the time of Mr. Hurlbut's death, then your verdict will be for the plaintiff." I think the judgment should be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

William H. CROSSMAN et al., Appls.,

v.

UNIVERSAL RUBBER CO. of New York,
Resp't.

(...N. Y....)

1. An election of remedies is not made by attachment and bill in chancery based on fraud in procuring credit on a purchase by an insolvent corporation so as to defeat an action on subsequently maturing purchase-money notes, as the remedies are not inconsistent, being in each instance for the recovery of price.

2. To prevent abatement of an action on purchase-money notes, it may be shown that a prior attachment and bill in chancery for the recovery of the debt had been respectively discontinued and unproductive.

NOTE.—The law as applied to the election of remedies.

Mr. Bigelow, in the fifth edition of his well-known work on Estoppel (1890), concisely states the law applicable to the doctrine of election: "A party cannot, either in the course of litigation or in dealing in pais, occupy inconsistent positions. Strosser v. Ft. Wayne, 100 Ind. 443, 452; Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. ed. 187; Moshier v. Frost, 110 Ill. 206; Lehman v. Clark, 85 Ala. 109; Rabittie v. Orr, 88 Ala. 185; Espy v. Comer, 80 Ala. 333; Jones v. Clouser, 14 West. Rep. 286, 114 Ind. 337. Upon that rule election is founded; 'a man shall not be allowed,' in the language of the Scotch law, 'to approbate and reprobate.' Citing Re Chesham, L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 466, 473. Chitty, J. And where a man has an election between several inconsistent courses of action, he will be confined to that which he first adopts. Steinbach v. Relief F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 498; Fields v. Bland, 81 N. Y. 239; Scholey v. Rew, 90 U. S. 21 Wall. 381, 23 L. ed. 99; Rodermund v. Clark, 46 N. Y. 354; Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552. See Meyer v. Clark, 45 N. Y. 286; Succession of Monette, 26 La. Ann. 28; Weedon v. Landreaux, Id. 729; Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 270; Watson v. Watson, 128 Mass. 152; Lilley v. Adams, 106 Mass. 50; Sloan v. Holcomb, 29 Mich. 153; Kunzie v. Wixom, 39 Mich. 384; Walsh v. Varney, 38 Mich. 73; Thompson v. Howard, 31 Mich. 309; Stoddard v. Cutcompt, 41 Iowa, 329; Lee v. Templeton, 73 Ind. 315. The election, if made with knowledge of the facts, is in itself binding,—it cannot be withdrawn without due consent; it cannot be withdrawn though it has not been acted upon by another by any change of position." Kinney v. Kiernan, 49 N. Y. 164; Syme v. Badger, 92 N. C. 708; Mendenhall v. Mendenhall, 8 Jones, L. 287; Jones v. Gerock, 8 Jones, Eq. 190; Yorkly v. Stinson, 97 N. What is conclusive evidence of election.

The case of Conrow v. Little, 5 L. R. A. 693, 115 N. Y. 397, 398, is to the effect that the commencement of the action, where all the facts are known, is conclusive evidence of an election. There must be a time when the election of the parties should be considered final, and that time is determined by the commencement of an action to enforce a particular remedy. It was also held that the discontinuance of such an action was immaterial. It was the fact that the plaintiffs once elected their remedy, and acted affirmatively upon such election, that determined the issue. After that the option no longer existed, and it was of no consequence, therefore, whether the plaintiffs did or did not make their choice effective. 2 Herman, Estoppel, 1172, § 1045.

Any decisive act of the party, with knowledge of his rights and of the fact, determines his election in the case of conflicting and inconsistent remedies. Sanger v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. 416, 1 L. ed. 668.

In Mattlage v. Poole, 15 Hun, 556, it was held, in substance, that where a vendor sells goods to the agent of an undisclosed principal, he may elect whether he will sue the agent for the price of the goods or the principal, but that he cannot have a recovery against both, and that where he has prosecuted the one to judgment he can have no recovery against the other.

In Bank of Beloit v. Beale, 34 N. Y. 473, the plaintiff had prosecuted his action, in which he affirmed the act of his agent, and stress was laid upon that fact. Davies, Ch. J., cited Lloyd v. Brewster, 4 Paige, 537, 3 L. ed. 551, in which the like fact existed and was made the basis of the decision, and Leonard, J., cited the case of Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552, where the plaintiff had replevied his goods.

In Wright v. Ritterman, 4 Robt. 704, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 423, it was held by the Superior Court of the City of New York that the pendency of an action on a contract for goods sold and delivered will not prevent the bringing of an action for the conversion of the same goods; that the plaintiff may have two remedies in such a case, and an adjudication brought to obtain either, whether for or against him, may be a bar to the other; but at any time previous to such an adjudication, he may discontinue the first action and proceed with the second.

Something more than the mere bringing of a suit is necessary to make the election final and conclusive, and to constitute it the act must be a clear and affirmative one, changing the relations of the parties to the subject matter, and which the party making the election cannot retrace without the other's consent. Deens v. Dunklin, 33 Ala. 47; Bennett v. Goldthwait, 100 Mass. 494.

(April 21, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment which had been entered, in accordance with an order of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York, after it had considered exceptions ordered to be heard before it in the first instance, upon a verdict which the judge holding the Trial Term had directed to be returned in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Bradley, J.:

Appeal, from judgment entered pursuant to order of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, denying new trial, and directing judgment on verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiffs, partners doing business in the firm name of W. H. Crossman & Bro., in the City of New York, about the 1st of May, 1888, sold and delivered to the defendant, a corporation of the State of New York, a quantity of goods, at the price of $9,309, for which the defendant gave them its three promissory notes of date May 5, 1888, payable to the order of the plaintiffs. This action was brought upon the one of them made for $8,166.61, payable at four months. The defense alleged is that before any of the notes matured the plaintiffs, by bill in chancery in the State of New Jersey, and by attachment in the supreme court of that State, had taken proceedings founded upon alleged fraud in the purchase by the defendant, and that by so doing

Where a party takes legal steps to enforce a contract, this is a conclusive election not to rescind on account of anything then known to him. Conrow v. Little, 5 L. R. A. 693, 115 N. Y. 387.

There are many cases where the fact of bringing suit to enforce one of two inconsistent remedies has been held an election, although the suit has not proceeded to judgment. One class of those cases is where the plaintiff has realized some benefit from the suit by means of a provisional remedy therein, or otherwise, as in Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552, where, in replevin, the plaintiff obtained a redelivery of his goods; or in Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49, where the plaintiff secured his demand by an attachment of property.

It is said in an instructive note to the case of Smith v. Hodson, 4 T. R. 211, in 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. p. 198, that "whatever may be the rule in other cases, there can be no doubt that when the ground taken in a suit is prejudicial to the other side by cutting off from a good defense, or precluding a recovery on a valid cause of action, it will preclude the person who adopts it from shifting his ground subsequently to the injury of his opponent. . . . The principle applies wherever an attempt is made to gain an inequitable or unfair advantage by presenting the same matter in different and inconsistent aspects. . . . and furnishes the true explanation of most of the cases examined in this note."

The right to rescind a contract for fraud must be exercised immediately upon its discovery, and any delay in doing so or the continued employment, use and occupation of the property received under the contract will be deemed an election to affirm it. Strong v. Strong, 3 Cent. Rep. 48, 102 N. Y. 69.

One cannot experiment upon a contract void for fraud by trying to enforce it with knowledge of the fraud, and that result being unsatisfactory seek at last to rescind it. Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 395.

When a party has elected to sue upon a written contract as it is, and has been defeated, he is bound by that election, and cannot thereafter bring an action to reform the contract. Steinbach v. Relief F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 498.

Adopting one of several remedies is a waiver of others.

A vendor of goods on a sale and delivery upon cash terms, if he fails to get payment, may consider the delivery absolute and rely on the responsibility of the vendee, or he may disaffirm or reclaim his property. But he cannot do both of these things. The remedies are not concurrent, and the choice between them once being made, the right to follow the other is forever gone. The law 18 L. R. A.

tolerates no such absurdity as a seizure of goods by a person claiming that he has never sold them, and an action by the same person, founded on the sale and delivery of the same goods, for the recovery of the price. In peculiar circumstances a party may take either one of these courses, but having rightfully made his choice, the right to follow the other is extinct and gone. Littlefield v. Brown, 1 Wend. 404, 7 Wend. 454, 11 Wend. 467; McElroy v. Manlius, 13 Johns. 121; Sanger v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. 418, 422, 1 L. ed. 668-670; Jenkins v. Simpson, 14 Me. 384; Butler v. Miller, 1 N. Y. 496.

A common carrier contracts with his passenger to carry him safely and to treat him respectfully, and if this contract is broken, and the passenger has sustained personal injury through the negligence or wrongful act of the carrier, or his agents or servants, the injured party may, at his election, proceed as for a tort, and recover according to the principles pertaining to that class of actions as distinguished from actions on contract. Baltimore C. P. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 619, 48 Am. Rep. 124.

Where common-law remedy is available.

It may be laid down as a general rule that when a statute prescribes a new remedy the plaintiff has his election either to adopt such remedy or proceed at common law. Such statutory remedy is cumulative, unless the statute expressly, or by necessary implication, takes away the common-law remedy. Miles v. O'Hara, 1 Serg. & R. 32; Boaz v. Helster, 6 Serg. & R. 20; Almy v. Harris, 5 Johns. 175; Farmer's Turnp. R. Co. v. Coventry, 10 Johns. 339; Colden v. Eldred, 15 Johns. 220; Booker M'Robert, 1 Call. 243; Bearcamp River Co. v. Woodman, 2 Me. 404; Fryeburgh Canal v. Frye, 5 Me. 38; Baltimore v. Howard, 6 Harr. & J. 383; Coxe v. Robbins, 9 N. J. L. 384; 3 Chitty, Pr. 130.

If a party resist a recovery against him in a court of law upon a portion of his defense, where he had full knowledge of the whole defense, and where, by due inquiry and ordinary efforts, he could have obtained the proof, he is, like other litigants in similar cases, bound by the election, and is deemed to have waived the grounds of defense so omitted to be made. Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark. 317.

But an unsuccessful effort to plead equitable defenses at law will not bar the defendants of relief in equity. Nelson v. Dunn, 15 Ala. 501.

And although the defendant in an action at law be able to prove that his signature to a writing obligatory was obtained by fraud, and thus to defeat the action, yet it is competent for him, at his election, to suffer judgment to go against him, and to apply to a court of equity for relief. Brittin v. Crabtree, 20 Ark. 309. See note to Terry v. Munger (N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 216.

the plaintiffs had made an election of remedy inconsistent with that of this action. The trial court held that such defense was established, and directed a verdict for the defendant. Upon that subject it appears that the defendant was engaged in business in New Jersey; and that on the 1st of August, 1888, the plaintiffs instituted a proceeding by attachment in the supreme court of that State against the property of the defendant, and that a few days after the plaintiffs filed a bill in chancery in that State against the defendant, as an insolvent corporation, alleging its insolvency, and its indebtedness to the plaintiffs for goods obtained from them; and that the delivery of the goods to it was brought about by fraud, in that the president of the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that the Company was perfectly solvent, by which the plaintiffs were induced to deliver the goods, and take the promissory notes, which they "bring into court and tender themselves willing to surrender, under the direction of the court;" that such representations were untrue, as the corporation was then insolvent, and known by such president to be so; and added that they "repudiate the contract, and would take back the materials delivered, if it were possible to do so;" and the prayer for relief was that a receiver be appointed and injunction issue. A receiver was appointed, whose duty it was to take possession of all the property of the defendant in the State of New Jersey, with a view to the ultimate distribution of the proceeds among its creditors, as provided by the Statute of that State relating to proceedings against insolvent corporations. As the defendant did not answer the bill, its insolvency may be assumed.

Mr. Carlisle Norwood, Jr., for appellants:

An election of remedies in personal actions is only the formal expression of an election of rights. The election of rights is in every case the exercise of the choice open to a party and the remedy selected is merely the expression of the choice made. In every case the courts have held the party to his choice, because his action on making it so affected the rights of the other party that an abandonment of such election to assert some different right would, in consequence of the first choice, be a prejudice to the party against whom such election of rights had been asserted, by cutting him off from a good defense, or precluding a recovery on a valid cause of action.

R. 1 Rol. 726, Z. 15 (Rolle, Abr. p. 726, line 15).

The expression in Comyn's Dig., Election C. 2, cited by Earle, J., in Fowler v. Bowers Sav. Bank, 4 L. R. A. 145, 118 N. Y. 450: "If a man once determines his election, it shall be determined forever," refers solely to "an election between a remedy by real action and a remedy by personal action," in a certain class of cases. Equitable Co-op. F. Co. v. Hersee, 83 Hun, 177.

In personal cases, a party does not have to abide by his first or other choice of a remedy.

Comyn, Dig. Election, C. 2, citing Co. Litt. 146. a, p. 178.

Where the courts have held that a party was bound by his "election of remedies," the term 13 L. R. A.

was misused, and in all the cases the courts intended nothing more than that he was bound by an election of rights, to which he gave expression, and of which election of rights he furnished evidence by the remedy or form of action invoked to enforce his rights.

See Kinney v. Kiernan, 49 N. Y. 168; Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166; Conrow v. Little, 5 L. R. A. 693, 115 N. Y. 387; Equitable Co-op. Foundry Co. v. Hersee, 4 Cent. Rep. 189, 108 N. Y. 26; Hays v. Midas, 104 N. Y. 602.

Mr. Benjamin Estes, for respondent:

The plaintiffs have elected their remedy in the actions in New Jersey. They have disaffirmed and repudiated the notes over there and got their remedy, and now seek to affirm what they entirely disaffirm in the other actions. This they cannot do. The course they have pursued in the courts of New Jersey is a perfect bar and defense to this action. It is not merely matter in abatement.

The doctrine of pleading the pendency of a former suit in abatement has no application. The suits are not for the same cause.

Terry v. Munger, 8 L. R. A. 216, 121 N. Y. 162, 167-171; Conrow v. Little, 5 L. R. A. 693, 115 N. Y. 387, 398, 394; Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 556, 557; Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166, 169; Rodermund v. Clark, 48 N. Y. 357; Kennedy v. Thorp, 51 N. Y. 176; Fowler v. Bowers Sav. Bank, 4 L. R. A. 145, 118 N. Y. 450; Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101.

Any decisive act of the party, with knowledge of his rights and of the facts, determines his election in the case of conflicting and inconsistent remedies.

Sarger v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. 416, 1 L. ed. 668; Littlefield v. Brown, 1 Wend. 398, 11 Wend. 467; Beach v. Tuch, 47 Hun, 536.

Powers v. Benedict, 88 N. Y. 605, 610, merely holds that where goods had been sold to a fraudulent vendee, the vendor might disaffirm the contract of sale, issue a writ of replevin for all the goods and take such as could be found and reclaimed, and for the rest he might prove a claim in bankruptcy against the fraudulent vendee for the value of such as could not be reclaimed.

Bradley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question arises whether the proceedings taken by the plaintiffs in the courts of New Jersey constituted an election of remedy inconsistent with that which they seek to enforce by this action upon the note taken by them for a portion of the consideration of the sale of the goods, which was the subject of those proceedings in that State. Those proceedings were taken there with a view to the collection of the purchase price of the goods sold, and such price is represented by the notes. The rule is well settled that, when a party has elected to adopt and has pursued one of two inconsistent remedies, he is not permitted to afterwards avail himself of the other. In Comyn's Digest, Election, it is said: "If a man once determines his election, it shall be determined forever; as, if an obligation delivered to the use of A be refused when he is first informed of it, he cannot afterwards accept it." And the same author adds: "But where an election is of several remedies, if he chooses one he may afterwards have the other in personal cases, as where he has election of several actions." It is the inconsistency of the remedy sought with that he has before adopted and pursued which determines the right of a party as between them; and this, as the consequence, is founded upon the principle that the other party may otherwise be in some manner prejudiced in respect to a defense or cause of action by the abandonment of the one and resort to the other of such remedies. But whether or not that is the effect is not the subject of inquiry. In the case where a party may resort either to an action upon contract or in tort, the election between them concludes him. And the question has more frequently arisen where a purchase of property is obtained by fraud. Then, after the seller has elected to rescind the sale, and has proceeded for the purpose of recovery of the property or for its conversion, he denies to himself the right to abandon that remedy, and seek to recover in affirmance of the sale; and the effect is the same when his election is effectually made to prosecute for recovery of the purchase money with knowledge of the fraud. He then has lost his right to rescind the sale and reclaim the property. Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166; Conrow v. Little, 115 N. Y. 387; Terry v. Munger, 121 N. Y. 162, 8 L. R. A. 216. And the same rule is applicable to other cases, where there are two existing and substantially inconsistent remedies. Then the adoption and pursuit of one of them excludes from the party the benefit of the other. Rodermund v. Clark, 46 N. Y. 354; Fowler v. Bowers Sav. Bank, 113 N. Y. 450, 4 L. R. A. 145; Kennedy v. Thorp, 51 N. Y. 174; Littlefield v. Brown, 1 Wend. 398.

But that incompatibility is not applicable to the present case. The attachment proceeding in New Jersey was instituted and had in affirmance of the sale of the goods to collect the purchase money, and the purpose of the suit in chancery there was the same. Neither was founded upon rescission of the contract of sale. Pursuant to the Statute of that State under which the bill was filed, providing for proceedings by creditors of insolvent corporations, domestic and foreign, the plaintiffs filed their bill, and caused the appointment of a receiver of the property of the insolvent defendant. It is true that in the bill they alleged fraud on the part of the defendant in making the purchase, and offered to surrender the notes under the direction of the court. But reference must be had to the nature of the bill, in view of its purpose, and of the Statute under which it was filed, to determine the character of the suit. It is seen that it was founded upon the debt arising out of the sale and purchase of the goods, and instituted to collect the purchase money. The consideration of the sale was what the plaintiffs sought to recover, and the attachment proceeding and the chancery suit were in the nature of proceedings in rem for that purpose. It cannot, therefore, properly be said that the plaintiffs sought to or did avoid the contract of sale; but that they did, for the purpose of an earlier remedy to obtain the purchase money, seek, by reason of the alleged fraud, to be relieved from the credit given. This did not have the effect to otherwise impair the contract of sale. Wegand v. Sichel, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 595, *8 Keyes, 120. In the suit and proceedings there, as in the action here, the purpose was to recover or collect the price for which the goods were sold. So far there is no inconsistency of remedy. The credit was there sought to be repudiated for the fraud, because the stipulated time of payment had not then expired. This action was brought after the expiration of that time, and is founded upon the promise of the defendant, furnished by its note, to pay such amount of the purchase money. The giving of the notes was not a payment, but their apparent effect was a suspension of the right of action to recover it. If the plaintiffs had recovered in assumpsit upon the implied promise to pay for the goods the amount of the purchase price, they would have been required to surrender the notes. But this they did not do, and they still hold the note in question. In effect, it is an express promise to pay so much of the purchase money. It is not seen how the remedy by this action is inconsistent with that founded upon the implied promise to pay for the goods; the practical effect is the same, and both proceed upon the affirmance of the sale. While the action upon the note is not consistent with the repudiation and proceeding in disregard of the credit in the courts of New Jersey, the incompatibility in practical effect had relation to the time of application of remedy, and not substantially to its nature or purpose. The conclusion follows that the defense cannot effectually rest upon the doctrine of election of remedies, as those pursued in the New Jersey courts were not inconsistent in their purpose and effect with that of this action. But relief from that defense does not necessarily enable the plaintiffs to recover here. When it appeared, as alleged, that the plaintiffs had taken the proceedings by attachment, and in the chancery suit in that State, their pendency there presumptively operated by way of abatement of the present action, else the plaintiffs may have had the means of twice collecting the same debt against the defendant. Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101. The plaintiffs, however, if the facts permitted, may have shown that those proceedings had been discontinued, or, as they did not charge the defendant personally with the debt, that neither of them was effectual to produce any fund to apply upon their claim, or that they could be productive of a sum applicable to it, sufficient partially only, and to what extent, to satisfy it. The plaintiffs offered to prove that the attachment proceeding had been discontinued; also offered evidence in relation to proceedings founded upon the chancery suit, with the view, as claimed, of making it appear that nothing had been, or could by them, as creditors of the defendant, be, realized by such proceedings; and that such suit was unproductive, through the action of the receiver, for such purpose. Those facts were essentially important, and, if permitted to prove them, it must, for the purposes of the question here, be assumed that they would have been shown by evidence legitimate for that purpose. The exclusion of the evidence so offered was error, and for that reason the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

HIGHLAND AVENUE & BELT R. CO.,
Appt.,
v.
 Margaret A. BURT.

(.....Ala.....)

Stopping a train drawn by a dummy engine with no regular stopping place for a reasonable time on a request to stop is not the full measure of the conductor's duty, but before starting he must see that no passenger is in the act of alighting, or in a position that will be perilous if the train starts.

(June 8, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was a passenger on one of defendant's trains drawn by a dummy engine. She told the conductor her destination and when the cars stopped there she attempted to get off and was injured. Plaintiff claimed that when the cars stopped she proceeded to alight without delay and that the cars started too soon, throwing her to the ground. Defendant claimed that the cars stopped a reasonable time to allow passengers to alight, that several did alight in safety and that before the conductor signalled to go ahead he looked to see if anyone else wished to get off and failed to see plaintiff, who was alighting from the opposite side of the car.

NOTE.—Duty of railway conductors in stopping and starting trains.

It is the duty of railway officials and agents to give passengers at its stations reasonable notice of the starting of its trains (Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Perry, 53 Ga. 461, 66 Ga. 746), and to give its passengers in its trains due notice of the approach of the train to its stations, in order that the passengers who are to leave the cars may prepare to alight. Dawson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 11 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 184. See Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 267.

Degree of care required of carrier.

The highest degree of care and skill is required in the transportation of passengers. Washington & G. R. Co. v. Varnell, 98 U. S. 479, 25 L. ed. 238; George v. St. Louis, Iron Mt. & S. R. Co. 34 Ark. 613, 1 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 294; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Dailey, 37 N. J. L. 528; Brunswick & A. R. Co. v. Gale, 56 Ga. 322; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Wightman, 29 Gratt. 431; Mackoy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 236; Jamison v. San José & S. C. R. Co. 55 Cal. 598, 3 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 350; Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Pillow, 76 Pa. 510; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. ed. 141, 1 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 225.

Where, after coming to a full stop, and while passengers were alighting, the train was suddenly moved without warning, it is immaterial whether the motion was backward or forward. The fact that a passenger injured under such circumstances was intoxicated would not relieve the company from liability. Such intoxication would have a bearing upon the question of contributory negligence. Millman v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Thomp. & C. 585, 4 Hun, 409, 66 N. Y. 642.

Length of stoppage.

A railway company has not discharged its duty to its patrons or relieved itself from liability to them until it has stopped at the end of their journey a reasonable time for them to get off the train in safety. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Parmelee, 51 Ind. 42; Keller v. Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. 27 Minn. 178.

It is the duty of a railway company, at a time when passengers are getting out of the cars, after an announcement by the conductor that ten minutes would be given for refreshments, to permit the cars to stand still. Sauter v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Hun, 446.

Railway trains are bound to stop at stations a reasonable length of time to enable passengers to get on and off. Swigert v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 18 L. R. A.

75 Mo. 475, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 322; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Rector, 104 Ill. 296, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 264.

Signals.

It is the imperative duty of a railroad company, through its proper agents, to give reasonable signals of the departure of its trains from its stations, and they should be such signals as would ordinarily attract the attention of passengers and others interested in the movements of the train. Should a passenger needlessly loiter about a railway station, and neglect to board a train, then the company, as regards such passenger, is only bound to exercise ordinary diligence; and it is the duty of the passenger to use caution in observing signals which might be given by the agents of the company. Perry v. Central R. Co. 66 Ga. 746.

Starting of train.

The fact that the conductor of a train about to leave a station is induced by the conduct and conversation of a person on the station platform to believe that he does not intend to take passage on the train will not relieve the company from liability for injuries received by such person in consequence of the conductor's starting the train without giving him time to get on, provided the conductor actually sees him attempting to board the train when he gives the signal to start. Swigert v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 75 Mo. 475, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 322.

A carrier is liable for injuries to a passenger in alighting from a train, caused by the starting of the train with a jerk without giving sufficient time to alight in safety. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Miller, 11 L. R. A. 395, and note, 79 Tex. 78.

He must provide safe means of access to and from its stations for the use of passengers, and passengers have the right to assume that the means provided are reasonably safe. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein, 7 L. R. A. 435, 52 N. J. L. 169; Murphy v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 32 N. Y. S. R. 381.

A railroad company is bound to use a high degree of skill and vigilance to guard against accidents to its passengers. Palmer v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 117 N. Y. 170.

The duty of common carriers with respect to the transportation of persons and property is independent of contract. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein, supra.

Duty of carrier to land passengers safely. See notes to Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Northam (Tex.) 3 L. R. A. 368; Walker v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. (La.) 7 L. R. A. 111.

The court charged the jury as follows :

"It was the duty of defendant, on reaching the stopping place at St. John's Church, to stop the dummy a reasonable length of time for plaintiff to alight, and the plaintiff's duty, when it stopped, to alight with reasonable diligence; that when it stopped, if the conductor went to the car in which plaintiff was, to help the passengers off, and if during such reasonable time given for passengers to alight plaintiff was up and in the act of alighting, it was the duty of the conductor to know it, and not start the train while she was in the act of alighting; that if the train stopped a reasonable length of time for the plaintiff to alight, and at the expiration of such time she was still in her seat, and not in the act of getting off, then the conductor had the right to turn his attention away from the car to the engineer, and to signal the engineer to go ahead, and if thereafter plaintiff arose, and attempted to alight, and fell, the defendant is not liable, unless the conductor or engineer actually knew she was trying to get off, and, so knowing it, could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have prevented her fall." The defendant requested the court to give the following written charges, which were refused: (1) "That, if the train stopped a sufficient time to allow the plaintiff time to get off, then the defendant was not guilty of negligence in its management." (2) "That if the jury believe that the car stopped at St. John's Church a sufficient time for plaintiff to alight, and the conductor, without knowing of the intention of plaintiff to alight there, and without knowing or seeing that she was in the act of alighting, started the train, then the defendant would not be guilty of negligence, and plaintiff would not be entitled to recover." (3) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the train came to a full stop at the place where the plaintiff wished to alight, and remained there long enough for two ladies in another seat of the car to alight therefrom safely, then, on the undisputed evidence, as to the character and construction of the car in which plaintiff was riding, this was a reasonable time for the car to stop for the plaintiff to alight." (4) "That if the jury believe from the evidence that the train of the defendant was stopped at St. John's Church for a reasonable time for plaintiff to have alighted from the car, then after this time the conductor was not required to be on the lookout for the plaintiff to alight." (5) "That, under the evidence in this case, the train stopped at St. John's Church a reasonable time for plaintiff to alight."

Mr. Alexander T. Loudon for appellant.

Mr. Richard H. Fries for appellee.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injury alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the negligence of the defendant by moving forward the train upon which she was a passenger while she was in the act of alighting, and before she had reasonable time to get off. We regard the law with respect to the duty to be exercised by ordinary railroads for the safety of passengers getting on and off their trains as well settled.

When a train of an ordinary railroad is brought to a stand-still at the proper and usual place for receiving passengers, and for permitting passengers to alight, and remains stationary for a reasonably sufficient length of time for this purpose, the duty of the trainmen in this regard has been performed; but, while the performance of this duty may relieve the trainmen from the further duty of seeing and knowing that the passengers are on or off, as the case may be, even this would not excuse from culpability, if those in charge of the train in fact saw or knew that its movement would probably imperil a passenger in the act of getting off or on the train, and, in disregard of the peril, caused the train to move, and thereby inflict injury. Montgomery & E. R. Co. v. Stewart (Ala.) 8 So. Rep. 711, and cases cited; Birmingham U. R. Co. v. Smith, 90 Ala. 68; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Miles, 88 Ala. 262.

The law has also been well settled in regard to the duty of the driver or the person in charge of a horse car operated for the carriage of passengers. In the latter case, it is the duty of the driver to await a sufficient length of time to enable passengers to alight in safety by the exercise of reasonable diligence, and, in any event, to see and know that no passenger is in the act of alighting, or is otherwise in a position which would be rendered perilous by a movement of the car. If he fail in these respects, and injury results from such failure, his employer is liable. 90 Ala. 68, supra. The reasons for applying a different principle in the case of ordinary railways and horse cars are fully stated in 90 Ala. supra. The case of North Birmingham St. R. Co. v. Calderwood, 89 Ala. 247, was one in which the passenger-cars were drawn by a dummy engine. Plaintiff testified in that case that she gave the notice to stop by pulling the bell strap, and upon this signal being given the train stopped. It was in evidence that, by a rule of the company, passengers were required to motion the conductor when they wished to get off. This much of the evidence is stated to show that the rules of the company in regard to stopping, applicable to ordinary railroads, having regular stations, did not apply, but its management for the convenience of passengers in regard to stopping was somewhat similar to that of street horse cars; that is, the train would stop, on being signaled to that effect by the passenger, at any place where a municipal ordinance did not prohibit it. After laying down the general rule applicable to ordinary railways, that the stoppage required was for a time reasonably sufficient to enable the passengers to conveniently alight, the court in 89 Ala., supra, added that "the duty of keeping a diligent lookout rested on the engineer and conductor, to see that a premature start of the train, such as might endanger her safety, should not be negligently made." Where dummy engines are used for the transportation of passengers, and conductors are in the control of the cars, and there are no regular stopping places or stations for receiving and putting off passengers, and the conductors are not informed in advance where the passengers desire to alight, and cannot know how many are expected to alight when the motion or signal is given to stop, and the rules and conditions for governing such engines and cars for carrying passengers are not such as to invoke the principles which prevail in ordinary railways, the presumption does not arise that the duty of the conductor is performed by merely stopping a reasonable length of time, sufficient to enable passengers to get on or off, but, in such cases, the same measure of duty is required as that imposed upon the driver of a horse-car; that is, he shall inform himself by looking and seeing how many passengers desire and intend to alight, and in any event, to see and know that no passenger is in the act of alighting, or in a position which would be rendered perilous by putting the car in motion. If after stopping and waiting a reasonable time for passengers to get off, the conductor places himself in a position where he can see and know, and there are no indications that others have any desire or intend to alight or get on, the conductor may then cause the car to move; and if passengers, after this, attempt to get on or off, without further notice to the conductor, and he has no actual knowledge of their intention and position, they do so at their peril, and not at the peril of the carrier. The first and second charges requested by defendant relieved the conductor of the duty to take any precaution or steps to inform himself as to whether plaintiff was in the act of alighting at the time he signaled the engineer to go forward. We are not prepared to hold "that a sufficient time to allow the plaintiff to get off" comes up to the rule declared in repeated decisions of this State, where we have held "that the train must await a sufficient length of time to enable passengers to alight in safety by the exercise of reasonable diligence" or "to conveniently alight." The charges asked to this effect were calculated to mislead in respect to the time the train was required to await. The court was not authorized to charge the jury, as a matter of law, that, because two other ladies had alighted with safety, the car had stopped a reasonable time. This may have been matter for legitimate argument before the jury, but did not authorize the legal conclusion. The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that she arose for the purpose of getting off as soon as the train stopped, and that she continued to move in that direction until she was thrown off by the sudden movement of the car. The same objection obtains against the fifth charge. This charge also invades the province of the jury. The fourth charge may assert the principle applicable to ordinary railroads, but does not apply to dummy engines, under the facts proven in this case. The charges given to the jury by the trial court are in accord with the views of this court herein expressed.

Affirmed.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to NOTE.—Fair criticism of public men allowable.

The public conduct of a public man is matter of public interest, and may be discussed with the fullest freedom. It may be made the subject of hostile criticism, provided the language of the writer be kept within the limits of an honest intention to discharge a public duty, and is not made a means of promulgating slanderous and malicious allegations. The question for the jury is whether the writer has transgressed the bounds within which comments ought to be confined; or whether it was made the opportunity for gratifying personal vindictiveness and hostility. Seymour v. Butterworth, 3 Post. & F. 372; White v. Nichols, 44 U. S. 3 How. 267, 11 L. ed. 561; Moore v. Butler, 48 N. H. 161; Forward v. Adams, 7 Wend. 204; Cook v. Hill, 8 Sandf. 341; *VanWyck v. The official conduct of men in public life, and the fitness and claims of candidates for official station, are fair subjects for review and criticism in the public prints, and such honest criticism, although it be unfriendly and severe, can give no occasion for the suggestion that it proceeds from unworthy or indirect motives. Hart v. Townsend, 67 How. Pr. 88.

Judges and text-book writers furnish plentiful definitions of what constitutes a libel, with varying shades of difference. They all agree that a malicious publication, tending to expose a person to ridicule, contempt, hatred, degradation of character, is libelous. 2 Addison, Torts, 309; Bergmann v.

recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Meers. A. Hemenway and H. N. Sheldon, for defendant:

The Byrne report and affidavits were, by reference, incorporated into the alleged libels. Accordingly this report and these affidavits should have been admitted in evidence as really a part of the articles complained of.

Cook v. Hughes, Ryan & M. 112; Van Vactor v. Walkup, 46 Cal. 124, 184; Darby v. Ouseley, 1 Hurlst. & N. 1, 11; Morehead v. Jones, 2 B. Mon. 210; Rez v. Lambert, 2 Campb. 398; *Weaver v. This evidence was competent upon the question of damages, to show that defendant had made its publications in good faith and without any actual malicious intention.

Blackburn v. Blackburn, 8 Car. & P. 146, 4 Bing. 895; Jellison v. Goodwin, 43 Me. 287; Hotchkiss v. Porter, 30 Conn. 414; Fry v. Bennett, 28 N. Y. 324; Stanley v. Webb, 21 Barb. 148; Brown v. Wright, 6 La. Ann. 258.

The defendant's offer was not, as in Lothrop v. Adams, 133 Mass. 471, 477, to show that reports were in circulation against the plaintiff, unknown to the defendant before the publication, but to show public documents published and circulated by the United States government, containing the same charges as the libels and weightier charges of the same character, and made in terms the express ground and foundation of its statements.

Whitney v. Janesville Gazette, 5 Biss. 380; Willover v. Hill, 72 N. Y. 86; Reynolds v. Tucker, 6 Ohio St. 516; Hatfield v. Lasher, 81 N. Y. 246; Larrabee v. Minnesota Tribune Co. 86 Minn. 141; Duke v. State, 19 Tex. App. 14.

These articles were privileged. If any of them were privileged, or if any of the charges made against the plaintiff were privileged, then the issue as to these was whether they were published without malice, in good faith, and in the honest belief of their truth; and the evidence offered was competent upon that issue.

Bradley v. Heath, 12 Pick. 163; Remington v. Congdon, 2 Pick. 810; Swan v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Lawler v. Earle, 5 Allen, 22; Atwill v. Mackintosh, 120 Mass. 177.

It was competent for the defendant to put in such testimony as this in mitigation of damages.

Cooks v. O'Brien, 2 Cranch, C. C. 17; Wetherbee v. Marsh, 20 N. H. 561; Minezinger v. Kerr, 9 Pa. 312; Galloway v. Courtney, 10 Rich. L. 414; Eviston v. Cramer, 54 Wis. 220; *Taylor v. The damages may be swollen by proof of actual or express malice; whether this is or is not contended to exist, they may be mitigated by affirmative evidence of the defendant's good faith and freedom from actual malice.

Scripps v. Reilly, 38 Mich. 10; True v. Plumley, 86 Me. 466; Haight v. Hoyt, 50 Conn. 588; Doe v. Roe, 32 Hun, 628; Symonds v. Carter, 32 N. H. 453.

The measure of damages depends in a large degree upon the motives which actuated the defendants in making the publication, and the circumstances under which it was made.

Caldwell, J., in Erber v. Dun, 12 Fed. Rep. 526.

Express malice aggravates the wrong done by the utterance of slanderous words.

Bigelow, Ch. J., in Markham v. Russell, 12 Allen, 573, 575.

In such case the degree of malice would properly measure the damages.

Coffin v. Coffin, 5 Mass. 1, 6, 44.

Though the presumption of legal or technical malice is conclusive so far as concerns the maintenance of the action, yet such evidence as was offered by this defendant is competent to reduce the amount of the damages.

These articles cannot be considered fair comments; nor is the honesty of the plaintiff, a private citizen, matter of public interest.

These articles, therefore, original with the defendant newspaper, were not themselves privileged to it.

Shekell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. 27.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case there must be a new trial. We shall state the grounds on which we come to this conclusion and shall discuss such of the rulings as dealt with questions which are likely to come up again. Some matters not likely to recur we shall pass over. The first question which we shall consider is raised by the presiding judge's refusal to rule that the articles were privileged. The requests referred to each article as a whole. Each article contained direct and indirect allegations of fact touching the plaintiff and highly detrimental to him, charging him with being a party to alleged frauds in the New York custom house. Some or all of these allegations we must take to be false. Therefore the ruling asked was properly refused.

We agree with the defendant that the subject was of public interest and that in connection with the administration of the custom house the defendant would have a right to make fair comments on the conduct of private persons affecting that administration in the way alleged. But there is an important distinction to be noticed between the so-called privilege of fair criticism upon matters of public interest and the privilege existing in the case, for instance, of answers to inquiries about the character of a servant. In the latter case a bona fide statement not in excess of the occasion is privileged although it turns out to be false. In the former what is privileged, if that is the proper term, is criticism not statement, and however it might be if a person merely quoted or referred to a statement as made by others, and gave it no new sanction, if he takes upon himself in his own person to allege facts otherwise libellous, he will not be privileged if those facts are not true.

The reason for the distinction lies in the different nature and degree of the exigency and of the damage in the two cases. In these, as in many other instances, the law has to draw a line between conflicting interests both intrinsically meritorious. When private inquiries are made about a private person, a servant for example, it is often impossible to answer them properly without stating facts, and those who settled the law thought it more important to preserve a reasonable freedom in giving necessary information than to insure people against occasional unintended injustice, confined as it generally is to one or two persons. But what the interest of private citizens in public matters requires is freedom of discussion rather than of statement. Moreover the statements about such matters which come before the courts are generally public statements, where the harm done by a falsehood is, much greater than in the other case.

If one private citizen wrote to another that a high official had taken a bribe no one would think good faith a sufficient answer to an action. He stands no better certainly when he publishes his writing to the world through a newspaper, and the newspaper itself stands no better than the writer. Shekell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. 25, 28.

The distinction to which we have referred has been brought out more clearly in England than it has been in our own decisions. Thus in Davis v. Shepatone, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 187, 190, Lord Herschell says: "It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct. In the present case the appellants in the passages which were complained of as libellous, charged the respondent, as now appears without foundation, with having been guilty of specific acts of misconduct, and then proceeded on the assumption that the charges were true, to comment upon his proceedings in language in the highest degree offensive and injurious; not only so, but they themselves vouched for the statements by asserting that though some doubt had been thrown upon the truth of the story, the closest investigation would prove it to be correct. In their lordship's opinion there is no warrant for the doctrine that defamatory matter thus published is regarded by the law as the subject of any privilege." Popham v. Pickburn, 7 Hurlst. & N. 891, 898; Le Pay v. Burnside, L. R. 4 Ir. 556, 565, 566; Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 Best & S. 769, 779; Walker v. Brogden, 19 C. B. N. S. 65; Reg. v. Flowers, L. R. 44 J. P. 377, 378; Negley v. Furrow, 60 Md. 158; Hamilton v. Eno, 81 N. Y. 16; State v. Schmitt, 49 N. J. L. 579, 586, 8 Cent. Rep. 626; Eviston v. Cramer, 57 Wis. 570; Scripps v. Foster, 41 Mich. 742, 746; Shekell v. Jackson, supra.

The foregoing language is applicable to the case at bar. The defendant in all the articles makes statements of fact on its own behalf, and in the second fairly may be understood to intimate that the private sources of information alleged by the words "we say this on authority," apply not merely to the existence of corruption in the New York custom house but to the plaintiff's connection with it. The articles published by the defendants so far as they contained false statements were not privileged.

We should add, however, with reference to another trial that there was evidence that some of the charges in the articles were true, and so far as the jury might find them to be so, inasmuch as the matter under discussion was a matter of public concern, the defendant would be justified not only in making those charges, but in free and open comment and criticism in regard to them.

The next question, the first which is raised by the bill of exceptions, is whether the court below rightly excluded a letter from the secretary of the treasury of the United States and an ex parte report on the same subject made to the treasury department containing similar charges against the plaintiff coupled with evidence that the writer of the articles had these documents before him and believed the statements contained in them. The evidence was offered to show that the defendant acted in good faith and as it is commonly said to negative express malice, in support of its plea of privilege, also as bearing on damages, and generally for any purpose for which it might be admissible.

We already have considered how the defendant stands in respect of privilege. It is said that the report tended to prove that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe the charges to be true, and that it tended to show that the plaintiff was less damaged than he otherwise would have been by reason of the fact that similar charges had been made and published before. As to the former of these suggestions it is enough to say that it is not a justification that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe its charges to be true. A person publishes libelous matter at his peril. Watson v. Moore, 2 Cush. 133, 140; Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 Allen, 406; Clark v. Brown, 116 Mass. 504, 507.

Then as to damages. The damages recovered are measured in all cases by the injury caused. Vindictive or punitive damages are never allowed in this State. Therefore, any amount of malevolence on the defendant's part in and of itself would not enhance the amount the plaintiff recovered by a penny, and reasonable cause to believe the charges or absolute good will would not cut it down. Watson v. Moore, Parkhurst v. Ketchum and Clark v. Brown, supra. Apart from the Statute (Pub. Stat. chap. 167, § 80) and possibly from privilege the defendant's motives and intent are totally immaterial. Its liability is the usual liability in tort for the natural consequences of a manifestly injurious act.

See Capital & Counties Bank v. Henty, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 741, 787. No doubt there might be cases, especially of slander, where it is impossible photographically and phonographically to reproduce the overt act complained of where the defendant's motive would afford an inference as to the character of the act and the impression made by it. No doubt a manifestation of malevolent motives might enhance damages under our rule allowing damages for injured feelings. Mahoney v. Belford, 132 Mass. 393, 394; Hastings v. Stetson, 130 Mass. 78, 78; Markham v. Russell, 12 Allen, 573. See Ford v. Ford, 143 Mass. 577, 579; Leonard v. Allen, 11 Cush. 241. But there is nothing of that sort in this case. Watson v. Moore, 2 Cush. 133, 140; Clark v. Munsell, 6 Met. 373, 388.

As a general proposition the defendant cannot show that the plaintiff's damages are less than they otherwise would have been because the charge has been made and published before. Mahoney v. Belford, 132 Mass. 393; Peterson v. Morgan, 116 Mass. 350, and cases cited; Alderman v. French, 1 Pick. 1, 18. See Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 491; Hatfield v. Lasher, 81 N. Y. 246, 249, 250.

But with reference to what we shall have to say concerning the fourth count, it should be added that probably a different rule would apply if the defendants' publication professes on its face to be based upon other publications which are referred to, and the fact is so.

The last ground on which it was argued that the report should have been admitted was that it was made a part of the libel by reference. We are of opinion that the articles with the exception of that set out in the fourth count do not refer to the report in such a way as manifestly on their face to need the report in order to explain them. The report was laid before us by agreement of counsel.

It is a very long document which it would have been useless to read through to the jury, and from such inspection as we have been able to make does not in any way explain, qualify or mitigate the expression used by the defendant. On the contrary, its only effect could be to raise either a belief or a strong suspicion that the defendant's charges were true. For that purpose it was of course incompetent, and therefore as a practical matter the only effect of allowing it to go in would have been an injustice to the plaintiff.

But the article set out in the fourth count stands somewhat differently from the others. This refers to the report in terms and then proceeds to say that the affidavits in the report and the later affidavits denying the former, when marshaled together, make a terrible indictment against the plaintiff; that the new affidavits evidently are intended to shield him; and implies that the public, on reading the two sets, will believe the former. The jury, if they should compare the documents, might agree with the inferences of the defendant, and to that extent might find the allegations of the article to be true. Under this count alone the report should have been admitted, for the above reason and with reference to the damages, as we have stated earlier.

Another exception is to the exclusion of evidence that the polariscope used in the Boston custom house did not give too high a valuation. One evidence of fraud in the New York custom house was that sugar was valued lower there than in Boston. The plaintiff admitted the fact and gave as one reason for it that the Boston examiner overestimated the quartz plate by which he tested his instrument. He gave this reason when attempting to secure the removal of the Boston examiner from New York after the latter had been sent there to reform the alleged New York practices. The evidence offered tended to prove the existence of the fraud and perhaps that the plaintiff knew of its existence and should have been admitted.

The court was asked to rule that the plaintiff could not recover for repetitions of the defendant's libels by others, and several other rulings tending in the same direction were asked.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "One who publishes a libel is not responsible for the publication of it by others; that is to say, he is not responsible for the injurious act of another. But there is a general principle which runs through all tort cases, which is generally stated in this way: That a man is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts, and that instruction therefore should be qualified in that way. He is not responsible for the injurious acts of another in publishing, but he is under obligations to the plaintiff to take into account and into consideration what will be the natural and probable consequences of his act in putting a libel into circulation. To that extent he is responsible, and only to that extent." The general proposition laid down is correct, no doubt if rightly understood, and it was applied to libel, under what circumstances and with what meaning does not appear, in Miller v. Butler, 6 Cush. 71. But if applied to libel or slander without further explanation it is likely to be misleading, and when put as a qualification of the ruling asked hardly can fail to be so.

The meaning which naturally would be conveyed to the jury is that, although a particular republication cannot be recovered for, damages may be enhanced by the general probability of unlawful republications. This is not the law. Wrongful acts of independent third persons not actually intended by the defendant are not regarded by the law as natural consequences of his wrong, and he is not bound to anticipate the general probability of such acts any more than a particular act by this or that individual. Hastings v. Stetson, 126 Mass. 829, 331; Shurtleff v. Parker, 180 Mass. 298, 296; Hayes v. Hyde Park (Mass.) 12 L. R. A. 249; Leonard v. Allen, 11 Cush. 241, 246. Exceptions sustained.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Francis C. LAWRENCE, Respt.,
v.
METROPOLITAN ELEVATED R. CO. et al., Appts.

(....N. Y....)

The use of a house as a place of prostitution does not affect the liability for depreciation of its value from the construction and operation of an elevated railroad in the street in front of it.

(June 2, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to his property by reason of the construction and operation of an elevated railroad in the street in front of them, and to enjoin the further operation of the road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Julien T. Davies and Brainard Tolles, for appellants:

Entirely irrespective of the illegality of the use, the fact that the premises during the period in question were applied to a use with which the elevated railroad did not interfere, was of the highest relevancy.

Tallman v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 8 L. R. A. 173, 121 N. Y. 119; Henderson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 423; Coltrick v. Swinburne, 8 Cent. Rep. 701, 105 N. Y. 508.

The rule of damage is the impairment of the rental value of the premises to the time of the commencement of the action, and the impairment must be determined with reference to the condition in which the premises were when the road was built and with reference to the uses for which the premises were then rented or to which they could have been put in the condition they were in.

Greene v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 65 How. Pr. 154.

If the use is illegal the law cannot recognize any such thing as damages from interference with it.

Kane v. Johnston, 9 Bosw. 154; Sherman v. Fall River I. W. Co. 5 Allen, 218; Jaques v. Bridgeport H. R. Co. 41 Conn. 61.

In a case where the law refuses damages for an interference with the unlawful use of property, equity will not intervene to prevent such an interference by injunction. The maxim is, that he who doeth iniquity shall not have equity.

Messrs. Henry A. Forster and John A. Weeks, Jr., for respondent:

Even if the house had been disreputable that would not have justified the defendant in taking an easement in it and damaging it greatly without compensation.

Ely v. Niagara County Suprs. 86 N. Y. 297; McKeon v. See, 4 Robt. 469; Blodgett v. Syracuse, 86 Barb. 526.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment awarded to the plaintiff

NOTE.—The rule in condemnation proceedings.

The true rule, the only rule, which will do equal justice to all parties is to determine what will be the effect of the proposed change upon the market value of the property. The proper inquiry is, What is it now fairly worth in the market, and what will it be worth after the improvement is made?—following Bronson, J. (Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. 649). The rule is itself approved in many subsequent cases, and in the Albany Northern R. Co. v. Lansing, 16 Barb. 71, it is said: "They" (the commissioners) 18 L. R. A.

"were to consider how the taking of the land . . . would affect the residue of the owner's land. Would it leave that residue in an inconvenient unmarketable shape? If so, this fact might properly be taken into the account in determining the amount of compensation. Thus, if the land to be taken should lie between the owner's house and the highway, the amount of compensation should be vastly more than for the same quantity of land, equally valuable in itself, but situate in some remote part of the owner's premises." Henderson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 423.

damages in the sum of $2,150 for loss in the diminution of rents of premises in Amity Street in the City of New York, owned by the plaintiff between April 26, 1882, and the time of the trial, occasioned by the construction of the elevated railway in the street, and also awarded an injunction against the further maintenance of the structure, unless the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the sum of $4,000, which was found to be the permanent depreciation in the value of the plaintiff's property by reason of the maintenance and operation of the defendants' road, upon the assumption that the street should continue to be used for the railway. The defendants do not assail these findings, nor question the measure or character of the relief granted by the judgment, except upon a single ground. Evidence was given tending to show that prior to the construction of the elevated railway, and from time to time subsequent thereto during the period for which loss of rents was claimed and awarded, the house on the premises was let by the plaintiff to tenants, and was by them used as a house of prostitution; the plaintiff, during the whole period for which damages were claimed, lived abroad, and the premises were placed in the charge of a real-estate agent, who let them for the plaintiff.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that the construction and operation of the railway in Amity Street had resulted in making the locality less desirable for residence purposes, and that, in consequence, the owners of tenant-houses on the street were obliged, in order that they should be occupied, to let them to an inferior class of tenants, for brief periods, and at a reduced rent. The plaintiff's agent rented the house in question to such tenants as applied, and, among others who occupied the house for a part of the period for which damages were awarded, were persons who used the house for disreputable purposes. It is not claimed that the house was let for the purpose of being used as a house of prostitution; and, while there is some evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's agent had notice that in some cases the house was so used, and that he renewed leases after such notice, there is an entire absence of any evidence that the agent in any way affirmatively aided, abetted, or countenanced such use, or that the rent was fixed with any reference thereto. The locality seems to have steadily deteriorated in the character of its inhabitants since the construction of the railway.

The defendants' counsel requested the trial judge to find that the plaintiff's house was used as a house of prostitution to the knowledge of the plaintiff's agent, and also that, for the purposes for which it was used, the acts of the defendants had caused no diminution in the rental value. The court refused these requests as irrelevant, and an exception was taken. Exceptions to the refusal to find these facts present the only questions upon which the defendants rely for a reversal of the judgment.

The principle that courts will not lend their aid to enforce any claim repugnant to justice, or bottomed upon an illegal transaction, or give relief contrary to good morals or public policy, is familiar, and is founded upon the most obvious policy. The rule is most frequently invoked in cases on contract. Where a party seeks to enforce a contract obligation the consideration of which is illegal, or which provides for the performance of an illegal or criminal act, the case is plain.

There is a class of cases, however, where the contract sued upon appears to have some relation to an illegal transaction, or in a sense to spring out of it, where the courts have had difficulty in determining whether the contract fell within the principle. The sale of smuggled goods, or the sale of goods which the vendor knew were purchased to be smuggled, doing nothing to aid or in furtherance of the illegal purpose beyond the bare act of sale, are exceptions.

The general doctrine in these and like cases was very exhaustively considered in the opinions on the argument and reargument in Tracy v. Talmage, 14 N. Y. 162, 210. In the present case the plaintiff is not seeking to enforce an illegal contract, nor, indeed, any contract at all. His claim is based upon a trespass, whereby he has been prevented from receiving rents from his house which he would have received except for the unauthorized use of the street by the defendants, and to restrain the further continuance of the trespass, except on condition of compensation being made for the injury to the inheritance. The fact that the house had been used as a house of prostitution did not enter as an element into the award of damages, nor could that fact be properly considered. If the plaintiff had sought to enhance the damages on the ground that the rental value of the house as a house of prostitution had been depreciated by the construction of the railway, and the award had been based upon that consideration, the defendants would have had just ground of complaint. If the fact had been found that the acts of the defendants did not diminish the rental value of the house as a house of prostitution, it would not show or tend to show that the plaintiff had not been injured in the amount awarded by the court. The testimony showed that the railway had diminished, by the amount awarded, the rents which would have been realized for the ordinary use of the property. We are of opinion that the requests to find were properly refused. They were based upon a misapprehension of the doctrine that courts will not enforce immoral or illegal claims. The particular use of the house had nothing to do with the injury suffered by the plaintiff, but the injury was wholly independent of such use. The occupation of the house as a house of prostitution was no justification of the injury of which the plaintiff complains. The plaintiff is not seeking to enforce any claim founded upon such occupation. The judgment neither sanctions nor encourages such use. It awards damages which the plaintiff has sustained, however the house may have been occupied. The case of Ely v. Niagara County Supra., 36 N. Y. 297, is quite analogous. It was there held that it was no defense to the liability of a county for the destruction of the plaintiff's house by a mob that the house was kept by her as a bawdy-house, and a resort for thieves and criminals.

The findings requested were irrelevant, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

All concur.

Re Application for Ancillary Administration upon ESTATE OF James D. PROUT, Deceased.

(....N. Y.....)

A bond for double the value of the personal estate in the State, as in the case of principal administration, may be required under Code Civ. Proc., § 2699, on granting ancillary administration, where the security already given in the place of principal administration is insufficient, although that section provides that the bond may in the discretion of the surrogate be in such a sum "not exceeding twice the amount which appears to be due from the decedent to residents of the State" as will secure resident creditors. The section is intended to allow, but not to require, a smaller bond than in ordinary cases.

APPEAL by Hannah M. Prout from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of the Surrogate for Kings County, requiring her to give a bond in twice the amount of the full value of the personal estate of James D.

Prout, deceased, situated in New York State, as a condition of his granting her ancillary letters of administration upon such estate. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. William J. Groo, for appellant:

On granting ancillary letters of administration the surrogate cannot require a bond exceeding twice the amount which appears to be due creditors in this State.

Mr. G. H. Crawford for respondent.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question turns upon the power of the surrogate to require an administrator's bond in double of the value of the personal estate, in this State, of James D. Prout, who, at the time of his death, was a resident of New Jersey, as a condition to the grant of ancillary administration. The personal estate of the decedent, at the time of his death, consisted of personal effects of the value of about $2,500, in New Jersey, and of stocks and securities of the value of about $40,000, deposited with a safe deposit company in the City of Brooklyn. On the first day of August, 1889, letters of administration were issued by the Probate Court of New Jersey to the widow of the decedent upon her petition setting forth that the personal estate of the decedent in that State did not exceed the NOTE.—Code provisions as to letters testamentary.

The New York Code of Civil Procedure, § 2699, relating to the grant of ancillary letters testamentary or of administration, authorizes a surrogate, upon the issuance of such letters, to fix the penalty of the official bond in his discretion, except that he cannot require any larger penalty than twice the amount which appears to be due to resident creditors. Evans v. Schoonmaker, 2 Dem. 249.

The Code requires that an administrator with the will annexed shall give security (§ 2645). It also gives to any person interested in the estate the right to insist that the bond given shall be in the full amount required by law, and with sufficient securities, and not only in an amount large enough to secure the separate interest of such person (§ 2697). Re Weeks' Estate, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 165.

Although Code Civ. Proc., §§ 2645, 2697, literally require an administrator with the will annexed to give a bond in a penalty "not less than twice the value of the personal property of which the decedent died possessed," etc., yet, where he is also an administrator de bonis non, those provisions are to be construed as fixing the minimum penalty of his bond at the value of the property left unadministered. Sutton v. Weeks, 5 Redf. 353.

Section 2697 confers upon the surrogate no authority to accept less security than double the value of the personal property of the deceased, exclusive of such claim, or to issue letters limiting in any way the administrator's authority over that property. Re Malloy, 1 Dem. 421.

Origin of the law requiring administration bonds.

The English Statute (21 Henry VIII. chap. 5, § 3; 22 & 23 Car. II. chap. 10, § 1), requiring bond to be given to the ordinary upon committing administration of the goods of any person dying intestate, is 18 L. R. A.

Incorporated into the statutes of every State in the Union. 1 Woerner, Administration, § 249.

The law in the several States is uniform on this point, requiring the administrator, whether with the will annexed, de bonis non, temporary or permanent, to give bond, with two or more sufficient securities, in a sum at least double the value of such personal property as may come into his possession belonging to the estate of the decedent; with the exception of Louisiana, where the minimum is fixed at "one fourth beyond the estimated value of the movables and immovables, and of the credits comprised in the inventory exclusive of bad debts" (Civ. Code, art. 1048), and Mississippi, where it must equal the value of the personal estate at least. Miss. Code 1880, § 1995.

In Pennsylvania, an administration where no bond is given is by statute declared void (Act March 15, 1832, § 27), and there, as well as in South Carolina, the register or ordinary neglecting to take the administration bond is liable for all damages; and although the damages do not appear to result from the neglect, yet the law will presume so. Boggs v. Hamilton, 2 Mill. (S. C.) 381. See 1 Woerner, Administration, § 249.

Statutory regulation of the subject.

In most of the American States statutory provision exists by virtue of which a testator may relieve his administrator or executor from the necessity of giving a bond by incorporating words to that effect in some recital of the will, and his wishes in this regard will be respected, unless it satisfactorily appears that there is danger of a fraudulent misappropriation or waste of the decedent's property, in which case the court will interfere and direct the execution of an appropriate bond. This rule is enforced in the following States: Alabama (Code 1886, §§ 2024, 2025); California (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1368, 1366); sum of $2,500. The administratrix, on the granting of the letters, executed her bond with sureties in the penal sum of $5,000 to the surrogate of Monmouth County, New Jersey, where the decedent resided, conditioned to account for the personal estate of the intestate "in the State of New Jersey," which has or shall come to her hands. The petitioner did not disclose in her petition the fact that there was any other personal estate of the decedent beyond what was in his actual possession in that State at his decease. On the first day of April, 1890, the widow, who with her infant child had become a resident of Brooklyn, applied to the surrogate of Kings County by petition, for ancillary letters of administration, the petition setting forth, among other things, the granting of the letters in New Jersey, and that the decedent left personal estate in Kings County of the value of about $40,000, and that one Moses P. Prout, of Brooklyn, is or claims to be a creditor of the decedent, and that there was no other person claiming to be creditor known to the petitioner. The surrogate thereupon issued a citation to creditors of the decedent, and on the hearing Moses P. Prout presented affidavits to the effect that the decedent was indebted to him in the sum of $7,371.73, with interest; that the decedent, at his death, was the owner of securities to the amount above mentioned, deposited in a safe deposit company in Brooklyn; that the only security given by the administratrix was the bond of $5,000, and that she had no pecuniary responsibility apart from her interest as widow in the estate of the decedent. The surrogate made an order that ancillary letters be granted to the widow, on condition that she should give a bond, with sureties, to be approved by the surrogate, in a penalty of double the value of that part of the personal estate of which the deceased died possessed, which at his death was within the County of Kings.

The administratrix appeals from the order on the ground that the surrogate had no power to require a bond upon the application for ancillary letters, in a penalty exceeding twice the amount of the debts owing by the intestate to creditors within the State. This question depends upon the true construction of section 2699 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section is as follows:

"Upon the return of the citation the surrogate must ascertain, as nearly as he can do so, the amount of debts due, or claimed to be due, from the decedent to residents of the State. Before ancillary letters are issued the person to whom they are awarded must qualify, as prescribed in article fourth of this title for the qualification of an administrator upon the estate of an intestate; except that the penalty of the bond may, in the discretion of the surrogate, be in such a sum, not exceeding twice the amount which appears to be due from the decedent to residents of the State, as will, in the surrogate's opinion, effectually secure the payment of those debts; or the sums which the resident creditors will be entitled to receive from the persons to whom the letters are issued, upon

Colorado (Gen. Laws 1883, § 3519); Connecticut (Gen. Stat. 1888, § 548; double the amount of debts); Illinois (Rev. Stat. 1885, p. 195, § 7); Kansas (Dassler's Stat. 1885, chap. 37, §§ 3, 4); Kentucky (Gen. Stat. 1887, p. 687, § 4); Maine (Rev. Stat. 1883, chap. 64, § 9); Mississippi (Rev. Code 1880, § 1982); Missouri (since November 1, 1879) (Rev. Stat. 1879, § 12); Nevada (Comp. Laws 1873, §§ 553, 559); Ohio (Rev. Stat. 1880, §§ 5993, 5997); Oregon (Code 1887, § 1068); Rhode Island (Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 184, § 14); Tennessee (Code 1884, §§ 3063, 3066); Texas (Rev. Stat. 1888, art. 1890, 1893); Vermont (Felton v. Sowles, 57 Vt. 382); Virginia (Code 1887, § 2842); West Virginia (Kelley's Rev. Stat. 1878, chap. 146, § 7), and Wisconsin, Rev. Stat. 1878, §§ 3794, 3795.

In England, and in several of the American States, the bond is dispensed with. Illustrations of this rule are found in the statutes of the following States: Florida (Dig. 1881, p. 79, § 11, p. 80, § 12); Georgia (Code 1882, § 2447); Louisiana (Civ. Code, art. 1877); New York (Code Civ. Proc. § 2638; Demarest's Estate, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 302); North Carolina (Rev. Code 1883, § 1515); Pennsylvania (Brightly's Purd. Dig. 1883, p. 510, § 21, p. 511, § 28), and South Carolina, Rev. Stat. 1873, p. 448 et seq.

In every case, when a complaint is made to a surrogate that the circumstances of a person appointed executor are so "precarious" as not to afford adequate security for his due administration of the estate (2 Rev. Stat. 72, § 18), it must depend upon its own peculiar features and circumstances, of which the surrogate is the appropriate judge. Shields v. Shields, 60 Barb. 57.

Nor has an administrator appointed in another State any authority here; but it seems that a voluntary payment to an administrator so appointed would protect the party. Williams v. Storrs, 6 Johns. Ch. 363, 2 L. ed. 148.

The power conferred by law upon executors and administrators cannot accompany their persons beyond the bounds of the sovereignty which has conferred it. Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509, 46 Am. Dec. 622.

Each of the sureties in the official bond of an administrator, etc., must be worth at least the penalty of the bond over all debts, liabilities and property exempt from execution. Where such a surety has become insufficient, since qualification, the surrogate's court may require a new or additional surety. Sutton v. Weeks, 5 Redf. 353.

Each administrator accounts for the property in his hands, before the tribunals of the State or sovereignty from which his authority emanates. Vaughan v. Northup, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 1, 10 L. J. Eq. 630; 2 Kent. Com. 431; Story, Conf. L. § 518; Banta v. Moore, 15 N. J. Eq. 97.

There can be no propriety in requiring security to be given in the State of the intestate's domicile for funds, to which the administrator, by virtue of the grant of administration in one State, has no title, for the due administration of which he has already given security in a foreign jurisdiction, and over which the tribunals of another sovereignty exercise legitimate control. Lewis v. Groganard, 17 N. J. Eq. 425.

Whether the executor's pecuniary responsibility, his habits and business, and other facts bearing upon the permanence and certainty of his circumstances, all considered, render the funds safe in his hands, is the main point to be ascertained. Cotterell v. Brock, 1 Bradf. 152.

The question for the surrogate is: Is it safe to put this estate in the hands of the person named as executor? Can he be trusted to administer it faithfully and honestly, as directed by the will? Martin v. Duke, 5 Redf. 600. See note to Williams v. Storrs, 6 Johns. Ch. 363, 2 L. ed. 148.

an accounting and distribution, either within the State or within the jurisdiction where the principal letters were issued."

If the surrogate had power to impose, as a condition to the granting of letters ancillary, that the administratrix should give a bond to secure the whole fund which might come to her hands by virtue of such letters, the imposition of the condition was a discreet exercise of such power. The general rule in this and other States requires that the administrator should give security in double the value of the personal estate of an intestate before assuming the administration. The actual location of the personal estate, or of the securities by which it is represented, is not, under our statute, material in determining the amount of the bond in a case of purely domestic administration, for the rule that personal property is deemed to follow the person of the owner fixes the legal possession in the intestate at his place of residence—wherever, in fact, the property may be. Where the administrator has properly qualified and assumed the administration in the State of the domicile, he is invested with power to receive the debts owing to the intestate, and take possession of the securities, and give proper acquittances wherever the debtors or securities may be, whether within or without the State.

But where a debtor or the securities are in a foreign jurisdiction, and are not voluntarily paid or surrendered to the administrator of the place of the domicile of the intestate, the courts of the foreign jurisdiction will not enforce the recovery of the debts or securities, upon his application, until he has procured ancillary letters or a new administrator has been authorized under the laws of the place where assets may be. It is unnecessary to enter into the reasons of this rule. They are familiar and the rule has been frequently recognized. See Parsons v. Lyman, 20 N. Y. 108; Despard v. Churchill, 53 N. Y. 192; Re Hughes, 95 N. Y. 55.

The unquestioned rule of the common law that the succession to and the distribution of the estate of an intestate is governed by the law of the domicile, makes security there taken on the granting of letters of administration covering the whole personal estate of the intestate an adequate protection to all parties interested, and where ancillary letters are applied for in another State or jurisdiction there would not seem to be any necessity that additional security should be required were it not for another principle almost universally recognized, that the claims of creditors living in a jurisdiction where ancillary letters are sought, are entitled to have their just rights in the assets of the intestate secured by a proper bond as a condition of granting the application. To this end security is usually required to be given by the applicant for ancillary administration enforceable in the tribunals of the place for the protection of creditors therein residing. The course of legislation in this State upon the subject of ancillary administration and the security required may be briefly stated. The Revised Statutes enacted that "every person appointed administrator" should give a bond in a penalty not less than twice the value of the personal estate of which the deceased died possessed. Provision was made for granting letters on the application of foreign executors or administrators where persons not inhabitants of this State shall die leaving assets here (§ 31). There was no provision exempting persons applying for ancillary letters, from the operation of the general rule declared in section 42, and it would seem that they, as well as domestic administrators, were required to give a bond in a penalty twice the value of the property upon which administration was sought. Section 2699, of the Code of Civil Procedure undertook to define the practice on the application for ancillary administration, which was left much at large under the Revised Statutes. In construing the section the various conditions to be provided for may justly be considered. There might be domestic creditors entitled to protection. The assets in this State might be less or more than sufficient to provide for the rights of citizens here. Or, again, there might be no creditors. Ancillary letters may become necessary to enable the administrator or executor to recover assets by hostile proceedings out of the jurisdiction where the principal letters were issued. It is contended on the part of the appellant that on an application for ancillary letters under section 2699 no security can be required in any case exceeding twice the amount of claims of domestic creditors, and that the discretion of the surrogate is only to be exercised within this limit. It is evident that this construction would, in the present case, defeat the general policy which requires an administrator to give adequate security for the whole estate which may come to his hands. The security given in New Jersey was limited to the sum of $5,000, double the value of the personal estate of the intestate in his actual possession there, taking no account of the much larger amount in this State, and this course seems to have the sanction of the New Jersey courts. Lewis v. Grogard, 17 N. J. Eq. 425.

The contention of the appellant, if sustained, would enable the administratrix to take into her possession $40,000, in securities belonging to the estate, without any security except a bond not exceeding double the amount of the debt of $7,805, alleged to be due to Moses P. Prout. It may be then that the primary purpose of section 2699 was the protection of domestic creditors. The citation is required to be issued to creditors only (§ 2698). The Legislature may have assumed that proper and adequate general security would be exacted by the law of the place of the principal administration. But, although the language of section 2699 is vague, we think it is capable of a construction which will subserve the general policy of the law. The Legislature in this section first declares a general rule, that before ancillary letters are issued, the person to whom they are awarded must qualify as provided in the fourth article of the title for the qualification of an administrator upon the estate of an intestate. Referring to the fourth title, it is found that section 2667 prescribes as one of the acts to be done by an administrator, to qualify him for the office, that he shall execute a bond in a penalty not less than twice the value of the personal property of which the intestate died possessed, subject to certain exceptions, one of which is that with the consent of all the next of kin of the intestate, the bond may, upon notice being given to creditors, be limited to twice the amount of their debts. The exception in section 2699 was, we think, intended to give the surrogate a discretion to modify the general rule declared in the preceding clause, and to accept a bond less in amount than that prescribed in ordinary cases of administration, if by reason of adequate security having already been given, additional security for the protection of the general interests was not, in his judgment, required, or where the next of kin had consented to waive security, and in a case of domestic creditors, where their protection was the only interest involved, to prescribe a limit, beyond which security should not be exacted.

It is somewhat difficult to so construe the language. But the solicitude with which courts guard the rights of infants and persons standing in the relation of beneficiaries of trusts, and the uniform policy in respect of security required of administrators, justify the court in going to the verge of construction in order to protect parties so situated, and to carry out the general policy of the law.

We think the order should be affirmed.
All concur.

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA.

(....Va....)

A state statute prohibiting freight trains running on Sunday between sunrise and sunset except with livestock or perishable freight, or to complete a trip which can be finished before 9 A. M., is invalid as a regulation of commerce so far as it applies to interstate freight trains.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Pulaski County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the County Court imposing upon defendant a fine for an alleged violation of the Sunday Laws. Reversed.

Statement by Lewis, P.

Error to judgment of the Circuit Court of Pulaski County, rendered March 25, 1891, affirming a judgment of the County Court of that county against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company in a prosecution for a misdemeanor. The indictment was for running a train of cars on Sunday, contrary to the Act of March 19, 1884, now carried into section 8801 of the Code. That Act forbids the running of trains between sunrise and sunset on a Sunday, except such as are used exclusively for the relief of wrecked or disabled trains, or for the transportation of the United States mails, passengers, live-

NOTE.—State law cannot regulate interstate commerce.

Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it, or burden laid upon it by legislative authority, is regulation. State Freight Tax Cases, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146; Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 847; Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 550.

It was said in Henderson v. New York, supra, to "be clear from the nature of our complex form of government, that whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied it may be to powers conceded to belong to the States." Substantially the same thing was said by Marshall, Ch. J., in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23.

As illustrating how far the Supreme Court of the United States has gone in defining "commerce between the States" as used in the constitutional provision on that subject, see The "Daniel Ball" v. United States, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 587, 19 L. ed. 999; Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547. See also Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238.

A question to be determined is this, Does transportation upon a railroad passing through more States than one, or from a point in one State to a point in another, constitute commerce; and, if so, is it commerce between the States? That such transportation is commerce, and commerce between the States, has been uniformly held both by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the supreme courts of a number of the States. State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 231, 21 L. ed. 163; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 847; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 464, 26 L. ed. 1068; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 591, 23 L. ed. 801; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 203, 29 L. ed. 161; Stone v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 116 U. S. 383, 39 L. ed. 645; Pickard v. Pullman S. Car Co. 117 U. S. 43, 29 L. ed. 738.

Any regulation by a State of the charges for the transportation of goods from one State to another is a regulation of interstate commerce, and a violation of the Federal Constitution. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Sessions, 28 Fed. Rep. 592, and note; State v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 162.

A statute prohibiting corporations engaged in transporting goods or passengers between different States from limiting their liability as common carriers by contract is not a regulation of commerce among the States. Hart v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 485.

For further annotation upon this subject, see notes appended to the following cases. State v. Wiggin (N. H.) 1 L. R. A. 56; People v. Budd (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 559; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Closser (Ind.) 9 L. R. A. 754; State v. Winters (Kan.) 10 L. R. A. 616.

stock, or articles of such perishable nature as would be necessarily impaired in value by one day's delay in their passage. Section 5258, Rev. Stat. U. S., however (not noted in the indictment), makes every railroad in the country, operated by steam, an agency of commerce for the transportation, among other things, of "freights on their way from one State to another State." There was a motion to quash the indictment, on the ground that it was not sufficiently certain,—that is to say, that, even admitting the charge in the indictment to be true, the defendant was not necessarily guilty of any offense under the laws of the land; which motion was overruled, whereupon the defendant pleaded not guilty. The facts were argued at the trial, and are as follows: That on Sunday, the 21st day of September, 1890, the defendant, by its agents and employes, ran over the New River Division of its Road, in Pulaski County, after 9 o'clock in the morning, and before sunset, a train of cars loaded with coal and coke, which was being transported from Bluefield, a station on defendant's road, in the State of West Virginia, into and through Virginia, and that said train was being run only for the transportation of said coal and coke. The defendant demurred to the evidence, whereupon the jury conditionally assessed the fine of $50. The county court overruled the demurrer, and rendered a judgment for the fine assessed, which judgment was afterwards affirmed by the circuit court.

Messrs. Phlegar & Johnson and Brown & Moore for plaintiff in error.

Mr. R. Taylor Scott, Atty-Gen., for the Commonwealth.

Lewis, P., delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant's contention on the merits in the trial court, and here, is that the Statute upon which the indictment was founded is, so far as it applies to a case like the present, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States. The precise propositions contended for on this point are: (1) That the Act of Transportation mentioned in the proceedings was commerce between the States; (2) that such commerce is, as to all matters that admit of uniformity of regulation, subject only to congressional regulation; (3) that section 8801 of the Code is a regulation of commerce; and (4) that, as such, it cannot be applied to interstate commerce, or to the train in question. It is an historical fact, well known, that to secure uniformity and freedom in commercial intercourse, and, with that view, to establish a single government empowered to regulate commerce, was the chief consideration that led to the formation and adoption of the Federal Constitution. Accordingly, that instrument ordains that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Art. 1, § 8. The power thus conferred, as the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly decided, is complete and exclusive. It is the unlimited power, in other words, to prescribe rules by which commerce shall be governed, and to determine how far it shall be free and untrammelled. Any attempt, therefore, by a State to regulate foreign or interstate commerce is the attempted exercise of a power which has been surrendered by the States, and granted exclusively to the national government. It is an attempt to do that which Congress alone is authorized to do, and hence is a nullity. As was said in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527. "Whatever may be the power of a State over commerce that is completely internal, it can no more prohibit or regulate that which is interstate than it can that which is with foreign nations. Power over one is given by the Constitution to Congress in the same words in which it is given over the other, and in both cases it is necessarily exclusive." And in a subsequent part of the same opinion it was said that transportation is not only essential to commerce, but that it is commerce itself, and that every obstacle to it, or burden laid upon it, by legislative authority is regulation. See also Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 391.

"It cannot be too strongly insisted upon," said the court in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244, "that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential, in modern times, to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it that the commerce clause of the Constitution was intended to secure; and it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, the State within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce." And in a still more recent case it was remarked that in the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulations, and not to a multitude of systems. Robbins v. Shelby County Taring Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694. There is, indeed, what has been termed a kind of neutral ground which may be constitutionally occupied by the State, so long as it interferes with no Act of Congress. Thus, where the subject is local in its nature or sphere of operation, such as the establishment of highways, the construction of bridges over navigable streams, the regulation of harbor pilotage, the erection of wharves, piers and docks, in these and other like cases, which are considered as mere aids rather than regulations of commerce, the State may act until Congress supersedes its authority, but where the subject is national in its character, admitting of uniformity of regulation, such as the transportation and exchange of commodities between the States, Congress alone can act upon it. The case of Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996, is sometimes cited as an authority to the contrary; that is, for the proposition that, in the absence of congressional action, a State may regulate interstate commerce within its own territorial limits. But this statement is broader than the decision justifies; for it was expressly said in that case that "whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit of only one uniform system or plan of regulation, may be justly said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress." And in the very recent case of Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, known as the "Original Package Case," where the subject is fully considered, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language: "The power to regulate commerce among the States is a unit, but, if particular subjects within its operation do not require the application of a general or uniform system, the States may legislate in regard to them with a view to local needs and circumstances until Congress otherwise directs; but the power thus exercised by the States is not identical in its extent with the power to regulate commerce among the States. The power to pass laws in respect to internal commerce, inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws, and laws in relation to bridges, ferries, and highways, belongs to the class of powers pertaining to locality, essential to local intercommunication, to the progress and development of local prosperity, and to the protection, the safety, and welfare of society, originally necessarily belonging to, and upon the adoption of the Constitution reserved by, the States, except so far as falling within the scope of a power confided to the general government." But these powers, it was said, "though they may be said to partake of the nature of the power granted to the general government, are strictly not such, but are simply local powers, which have full operation until or unless circumscribed by the action of Congress in effectuation of the general power." And in the same case the principle was again announced, as it had often been before, that the transportation of passengers or of merchandise from one State to another is in its nature not local, but national, and therefore admitted of but one regulating power.

These authorities, which are only a few of many that might be cited to the same effect, are sufficient to show the invalidity of legislation by the States in regard to subjects of commerce which are in their nature national, no matter what may be the avowed object of such legislation, and that nothing is gained by calling it the "police power." The subject was elaborately discussed, and with his accustomed force, by Mr. Justice Miller, in Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543, where it was declared that, however difficult it may often be to distinguish between one class of legislation and another, it is clear, from our complex form of government, that whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to Congress it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied to powers conceded to belong to the States. In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, supra, it was said: "We admit that the deposit in Congress of the power to regulate foreign commerce, and commerce among the States, was not a surrender of that which may properly be denominated 'police power.' What that power is, it is difficult to define with sharp precision. It is generally said to extend to making regulations promotive of domestic order, morals, health and safety. . . . But whatever may be the nature and reach of that power," it was added, "it cannot be exercised over a subject confided exclusively to Congress by the Federal Constitution. It cannot invade the domain of the national government." Nor does it matter, in such a case, that Congress has not acted; for it is now settled that the silence of Congress is not only not a concession that the powers reserved by the States may be exerted as if the specific power had not been elsewhere reposed, but, on the contrary, the only legitimate conclusion is that the general government intended that power should not be affirmatively exercised, and the action of the States cannot be permitted to effect that which would be incompatible with such intention. "Hence," as was decided in Leisy v. Hardin, following many previous decisions, "inasmuch as interstate commerce, consisting in the transportation, purchase, sale and exchange of commodities, is national in its character, and must be governed by a uniform system, so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate it, or allowing the States so to do, it thereby indicates its will that such commerce shall be free and untrammelled." In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, the court in an opinion by Mr. Justice Lamar, said: "Whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one State to another, commerce in that commodity between the States has commenced. The fact that several different and independent agencies are employed in transporting the commodity, some acting entirely in one State, and some acting through two or more States, does in no respect affect the character of the transaction. To the extent in which each agency acts in that transaction, it is subject to the regulation of Congress." It is also a well-established principle that an article of commerce transported from one State to another is protected by the Constitution against interfering state legislation until it has mingled with, and become a part of, the common mass of property within the latter State; and, if this be so, a fortiori is it protected while in transitu. Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Wellton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347; Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128. Tested by these principles, which are axiomatic, it is clear that the judgment complained of is erroneous.

That the transportation of the coal and coke mentioned in the proceedings was an act of commerce, national in its character, is too plain to admit of doubt; and it is equally clear that the legislation in question, in so far as it extends to a case like the present, is unwarranted and void. A Statute which forbids the running of interstate freight trains between sunrise and sunset on a Sunday is, by its necessary operation, no matter what its professed object may be, a regulation of commerce. At all events, it is an obstruction to interstate commerce, which, for the purposes of the present case, amounts to the same thing, for, in any view, it is an invasion of the exclusive domain of Congress, and therefore void. To say that the State may, in the exercise of her police powers, enforce by statute the observance of the Sabbath, not as a religious duty, but as a day of rest, is no answer to the constitutional objection here raised. The validity of such legislation, when not in conflict with a higher law, is acknowledged by all, and its wisdom and propriety denied by none, certainly not by this court. But when, in a case like the present, it contravenes the Constitution of the United States, the latter must prevail, because it is "the supreme law" in all matters relating to the regulation of interstate commerce. Such a statute, if passed by Congress, so far as it concerns foreign or interstate commerce, would be valid, not, however, as the exercise of police power, but as a regulation of commerce; and the reason which would make such legislation valid as an Act of Congress makes it invalid as an Act of a State Legislature. As to the effect of the Statute in question, if sustained, upon the commercial interests of the country, we need not stop to inquire. It is enough to say that, to the extent indicated, it is not valid. In Henderson v. New York, supra, it was decided that, whatever may be the nature and extent of the police power of the State, "no definition of it and no urgency for its use, can authorize a State to exercise it in regard to a subject matter which has been confined exclusively to the discretion of Congress by the Constitution." This principle was reaffirmed in Leisy v. Hardin, where it is said that such a subject matter is not within the police power of a State, unless placed there by congressional action; and the observations of Mr. Justice Matthews in Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 125 U. S. 465, 81 L. ed. 700, were quoted in the opinion, to the effect that, in view of the commercial anarchy and confusion that would result from the diverse exertions of power by the several States of the Union, it cannot be supposed that the Constitution or Congress have intended to limit the freedom of commercial intercourse among the people of the several States. The fact, if it be a fact, that the statute in question was not intended as a regulation of commerce, does not, we repeat, affect the case. There may be no purpose, it has been held, upon the part of a Legislature, to violate the Constitution, and yet a statute, enacted under the forms of law, may, by its necessary operation, injuriously affect rights secured by the Constitution, in which case the statute, to that extent, must be declared void. Drimmer v. Reisman, 188 U. S.

78, 84 L. ed. 862. This is merely stating in different form the proposition affirmed in the Henderson Case, namely, that, in whatever language a statute may be framed, its constitutional validity must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect,—a proposition that would seem to be incontrovertible. In the last-mentioned case, a statute of New York which required the master or owner of every vessel landing passengers at the Port of New York from a foreign country to give a bond in a prescribed penalty for each passenger so landed, as an indemnity against any expense to be incurred by the State or city for the support of such passengers, was held void, as being a regulation of commerce, although it was sought to be sustained as a police regulation to protect the State against the influx of paupers; the practical result of the statute being to impose a burden upon all passengers so landed from a foreign country. So, in the case of Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 550, a similar statute of California, intended to prevent the introduction of lewd women into that State, was held void, as going beyond the necessity of the case, and amounting, in its practical operation, to a regulation of foreign commerce. Upon the same principle, statutes prohibiting the introduction of intoxicating liquors into the State enacting them have been held to be infringements of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and not valid police regulations to guard against the evils of intemperance. And numerous illustrations of the same principles are to be found in the adjudged cases, all of which show that when, in the attempted exercise of the police power, no matter upon what grounds it is sought to be exercised, the action of a State comes in conflict with a power vested exclusively by Constitution in Congress, such attempt is a nullity; and the present case comes within this principle.

The power of the State to enforce observance of the Sabbath as a police regulation stands upon no higher footing than her power to guard against the evils of vice or intemperance, or of imported pauperism, or infectious diseases. In either case the nature and extent of the power is exactly the same, and there is no principle for holding otherwise. Our attention has been called, in this connection, to State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 24 W. Va. 783, wherein a "Sunday Law," so called, similar to the one we are considering, was upheld, under circumstances resembling those of the present case. The court in that case admitted that the transportation between the States is commerce between the States, and that such commerce is necessarily under the exclusive control of Congress; but it denied that non-action by Congress is equivalent to a declaration that such commerce shall be free and untrammelled, and upon that ground sustained the statute in toto. As to the last proposition, we have already shown by the cases referred to—some of them decided since that case was decided—that the rule is otherwise, and, after a careful examination of the case, we find nothing in it to raise a doubt that the rule has been rightly settled.

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the defendant discharged from further prosecution under this indictment, which ought to have been quashed.

Lacy, J., dissenting:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Pulaski County, rendered at the March Term, 1891, when the circuit court affirmed the judgment of the county court, rendered at the February Term, 1891, of said county court, where the plaintiff in error was convicted for a violation of the Sunday Laws of this Commonwealth, and adjudged to pay a fine of $50. It is admitted that the said plaintiff in error openly violated the law of the State, upon the ground that it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, because it is an interference by the State with the subject of commerce among the States; that the Constitution of the United States provides (art. 1, § 8) that the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes. Our Code provides that "if a person, on a Sabbath day, be found laboring at any trade or calling, or employ his apprentices or servants in labor or other business, except in household or other work of necessity or charity, he shall forfeit $2 for each offense. Every day any servant or apprentice is so employed shall constitute a distinct offense." Code Va. § 3799. This plaintiff in error is a domestic corporation, domiciled within the State of Virginia, holding its chartered rights under the grant of the State, whose charter, by its express terms, provides that it may be altered, modified or repealed by any future Legislature as may think proper. Id. § 1240. The absolute prohibition against laboring at its calling being, in the legislative mind, inexpedient in its application to this or other domestic corporations, the Legislature, in 1884, enacted a statute which modified the general law, and excepted such trains as were loaded with passengers and perishable freight, and which suffer injury by delay, and provided as follows: "No railroad company, receiver, or trustee controlling or operating a railroad shall, by any agent or employé, load, unload, run or transport upon such road on a Sunday any car, train of cars or locomotive, nor permit the same to be done by any such agent or employé, except when such cars, trains or locomotives are used exclusively for the use of wrecked trains, or trains so disabled as to obstruct the main track of the railroad, or for the transportation of the United States mail, or for the transportation of passengers and their baggage, or for the transportation of live-stock, or for the transportation of articles of such perishable nature as would be necessarily impaired in value by one day's delay in their passage: provided, however, that, if it should be necessary to transport live-stock or perishable articles on a Sunday to an extent not sufficient to make a whole train-load, such train-load may be made up with cars loaded with ordinary freight." Section 8802 provides that "the word 'Sunday,' in the preceding section, shall be construed to embrace only that portion of the day between sunrise and sunset; and trains in transitu having started prior to twelve o'clock on Saturday night may, in order to reach the terminus or shops of the railroad, run until nine o'clock the following Sunday morning, but not later." Section 8803 provides the penalty, which is immaterial in this case; the fine assessed not being in violation thereof. These sections constitute our Sunday Laws, not very stringent, it must be admitted, as far as railroads are concerned; its extreme liberality in the privileges to labor on the Sabbath accorded therein suggesting the thought that, when the law was drawn, the railroads in some form stood by consenting; but how this is I have no information. However that may be, the law is now obnoxious to the railroad in question, and in some localities the lower courts have refused to enforce the law.

The question now to be inquired into is, What is the nature of this law? Is it an Act to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the States, or with the Indian tribes? And does it thus invade the granted powers of the Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, and conflict with them? If so, it cannot be upheld. It certainly was not so intended. Nothing is said about commerce nor about transportation between the States. It is absolutely limited in its operation to the State of Virginia. It is to be found in the chapter of our Code entitled "Of Offenses against Morality or Decency; Protection of Religious Meetings." The section which precedes it is entitled "Profane Swearing and Drunkenness, how Punished." The section which succeeds it is entitled "Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday, how Punished." The next is, "Disturbance of Religious Worship, how Punished." It is intended as an exercise of the police power of the State, in the interest of morality and decency, and that is what I think it is. It is no part of the province of Congress, under its granted powers, to enact police laws for the regulation of such affairs within a State; and if this State may not enact, for the protection of its citizens, police laws for the observance of the Sabbath day, we must ever remain practically without such. I think I am sustained in this view by the decision of the courts of this country, both state and federal; and I will briefly proceed to consider this. Commerce consists of the various agreements which have for their object facilitating the exchange of the products of the earth, or the industry of man, with the intent to realize a profit. Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation, and the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. The power conferred upon the Congress by the above clause is exclusive, so far as it relates to matters within its purview which are material in their character, and admit of a requisite uniformity of regulation affecting all the States. That clause was adopted in order to secure uniformity against discriminating state legislation. State legislation is not forbidden in matters either local in their operation, or intended to be mere aids to commerce, for which special regulations can more effectually provide, such as harbors, pilotage, beacons, buoys and other improvements of harbors, bays and rivers within a State, if their free navigation be not thereby impaired. Congress, by its inaction in such matters, virtually declares that until it deems best to act they may be controlled by the State. Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238 (opinion of Mr. Justice Field). In the case of Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819, the same learned justice said: "In supposed support of this position, numerous decisions of this court are cited by counsel to the effect that the States cannot by legislation place burdens upon commerce with foreign nations or among the several States." Upon an examination of these cases, it will be found that the legislation adjudged invalid imposed a tax upon some instrument or subject of commerce, or exacted a license fee from parties engaged in commercial pursuits, or created an impediment to the free navigation of some public waters, or prescribed conditions in accordance with which commerce in particular articles or between places was required to be conducted. In all the cases the legislation condemned operates directly upon commerce, either by way of tax upon its business, license upon its pursuits in particular channels, or conditions for carrying it on. Thus, in the Passenger Cases, reported in 48 U. S. 7 How. 445, 12 L. ed. 770, the laws of New York and Massachusetts exacted a tax from the captains of vessels bringing passengers from foreign ports for every passenger landed. In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., reported in 54 U. S. 13 How. 518, 14 L. ed. 249, the statute of Virginia authorized the erection of a bridge which was held to obstruct the free navigation of the river Ohio. And in all the other cases, when legislation of a State has been held to be null for interfering with the commercial power of Congress,—as in Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 425, 6 L. ed. 680; Tax Cases, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 204, 20 L. ed. 370; and in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 847,—the legislation created in the way of tax, license or condition a direct burden upon commerce, or in some way directly interfered with its freedom; and it may be said generally that the legislation of a State not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit. Judge Cooley says, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 722): "The line of distinction between that which constitutes an interference with commerce and that which is a mere police regulation is sometimes dim and shadowy, and it is not to be wondered at that learned jurists differ when endeavoring to classify the cases which arise. It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is accustomed to establish, and to descend to the most minute directions, if it shall be deemed advisable; and that to whatever extent ground shall be covered by these directions the exercise of state power is excluded.

Congress may establish police regulations as well as the States, confining their operations to the subjects over which it is given control by the Constitution. But as the general police power can better be exercised under the supervision of the local authorities, and mischiefs are not likely to spring therefrom so long as the power to arrest collision resides in the national courts, the regulations that are made by Congress do not often exclude the establishment of others by the State covering very many particulars. Moreover, the regulations of commerce are usually, and in some cases must be, general and uniform for the whole country; while in some localities state and local policy will demand peculiar regulations with reference to special and peculiar circumstances." In the late case of Cordwell v. American R. Bridge Co., 113 U. S. 205, 28 L. ed. 959, after citing the earlier cases, the court said that they illustrate the general doctrine, now fully recognized, that the commercial power of Congress is exclusive of state authority only when the subjects upon which it is exerted are national in their character, and admit and require uniformity of regulations affecting all the States; and that when the subjects within that power are local in their nature or operation, or constitute mere aids to commerce, the States may provide for their regulation and management until Congress interferes and supersedes their action. I will cite as an illustration of my view of this subject yet another decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this subject, which applies to a through line of railway, and is much in point. In the case of Stone v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 686 (one of the Railroad Commission Cases), that court said: "There can be no doubt that each of the States through which the Mobile & Ohio R. R. passes incorporated the Company for the purpose of securing the construction of a continuous line of interstate communication between the Gulf of Mexico, in the south, and the Great Lakes, in the north. It is equally certain that Congress aided in the construction of parts of this line of road, so as to establish such a route of travel and transportation; but it is none the less true that the corporation created by each State is, for the purposes of local government, a domestic corporation, and that its railroad within the State is a matter of domestic concern. Mississippi may govern this corporation as it does all domestic corporations, in respect to every act, and everything within the State which is the lawful subject of state government. It may, beyond all question, by the settled rule of decision of this court, regulate freights and fares for business done exclusively within the State; and it would seem to be a matter of domestic concern to prevent the company from discriminating against persons and places in Mississippi.

So it may make all needful regulations of a police character for the government of the company while operating its road in that jurisdiction. In this way it may certainly require the company to fence, etc., as much of its road as lies within the State, to stop its trains at railroad crossings, to slacken speed while running in a crowded thoroughfare, to put its tariffs and time-tables at proper places, etc. This company is not entirely relieved from state control in Mississippi, simply because it has been incorporated by, and is carrying on business in, the other States through which its road runs. While in Mississippi it can be governed by Mississippi in respect to all things which have not been placed by the Constitution of the United States within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. It is not enough to prevent the State from acting that the road in Mississippi is used in aid of interstate commerce. Legislation of this kind, to be unconstitutional, must be such as will necessarily amount to or operate as a regulation of business without the State as well as within." See also Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 506; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 352; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 657; Rae v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 401; Iowa v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 391; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Becker, 82 Fed. Rep. 849. And as to the right of the State to regulate the charge for taking on through cars—"switching" as it is called—by a state commission it was held to have no reference to interstate commerce, in the case of Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Becker, supra. And again it was held in State of Iowa v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 891, that, even if such switching be an act of interstate commerce, such regulation is valid, as it does not refer to the carriage of freight outside the State. And, again, it was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, that the power to prescribe regulations to protect the health of the community, and to prevent the spread of disease, is incident to all local municipal authority, however much such regulations may interfere with interstate commerce. The Interstate Commerce Act itself, passed February 4, 1887, and amended March 2, 1889, when Congress subjected to its control all common carriers engaged in continuous interstate or international transportation of passengers or property, was held not to include the carriage or handling of passengers, by rail or otherwise, when such carriage or handling is performed wholly within a State. Ex parte Koehler, 30 Fed. Rep. 887. This is the result of all the decisions of the federal courts. If the Act in question only applies to and operates upon transportation within the State, it is immaterial that the company operated on is part of an interstate line. It must not only affect commerce, but it must affect commerce with foreign nations, or among the States, or with the Indian tribes. But, if the Act is one done in the exercise of a police power, it is within the legitimate and unchallenged domain of the State; such as to regulate concerning the public health, public peace and morality and decency.

Now, what is this police power, and where does it reside? It is defined to be the authority to establish, for the intercourse of the several members of the body politic with each other, those rules of good conduct and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with a corresponding enjoyment by others, and is usually spoken of as the authority or power of police. This is a most comprehensive branch of sovereignty, extending, as it does, to every person, every public and private right, everything in the nature of property, every relation in the State, in society, and in private life. The power vested in the Legislature to make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes and ordinances as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth, and for the subjects of the same. The exercise of this power, at least, has been left with the individual States, and cannot be taken from them, and exercised wholly or in part under legislation of Congress. Cooley, Const. Lim. 715; United States v. Dewitt, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 598.

Quarantine and health laws of every description, proper regulations for the use of highways, and the general right to control and regulate the public use of navigable waters are unquestionably with the State under the police power. Indeed, the police power of a State, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulations by which the State seeks, not only to preserve the public order, and to prevent offenses against the State, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizen with citizen those rules of good manners which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights. Judge Cooley says, in the American-constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the States individually, and it cannot be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and exercised under legislation of Congress; so decided, as we have seen, in United States v. Dewitt, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 598. Neither can the national government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States. The State may also, under this power, says the same learned author, regulate the grade of railways, and prescribe how and upon what grade railway tracks may cross each other; and it may apportion the cost of making the necessary crossings between the corporations owning the roads; and it may establish regulations requiring existing railways to ring the bell or blow the whistle of their engines immediately before passing highways at grade, or other places when their approach might be dangerous to travel, or to station flightmen at such or any other dangerous places. The Legislature has power by general laws, from time to time, as the public exigencies may require, to regulate corporations in their franchises so as to provide for the public safety. This is held to be a mere police regulation. Galena, C. & U. R. Co. v. Loomis, 13 Ill. 548. But certain powers directly affecting commerce may sometimes be exercised, when the purpose is not to interfere with congressional legislation, but merely to regulate the time and manner of transacting business with a view to facilitate trade, secure order, and prevent confusion. Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 351, where Woodworth, J., states very clearly the principles on which police regulations are sustained in such cases.

We have said that the laws to prevent the desecration of the Sabbath came properly under the police power of the State. Judge Cooley says, on this subject, the statute for the punishment of public profanity requires no further justification than the natural impulses of every man who believes in a Supreme Being, and recognizes His right to the reverence of His creatures. The laws against the desecration of the Christian Sabbath by labor or sports are not so readily defensible by arguments, the force of which will be admitted by all. The laws which prohibit ordinary employments are to be defended either on the same ground which justifies the punishment of profanity, or as establishing sanitary regulations, based upon the demonstration of experience that one day's rest in seven is needful to recuperate the exhausted energies of body and mind. Judge Cooley, speaking of those laws enacted to prevent desecration of the Sabbath, says they are not unconstitutional as a restraint upon trade and commerce. There can no longer be any question, if any there ever was, that such laws may be supported as regulations of police. Specht v. Com. 8 Pa. 812; Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387; Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 678; Ex parte Bird, 19 Cal. 190. Upon this subject of the Sabbath day observance, I have found none but state decisions in a great multitude of cited cases. It does not appear to have been ever, so far as my investigation has gone,—which has been somewhat limited, and not thorough,—a matter of decision with the federal courts, so far as the States are concerned. And I believe there is no probability that Congress will ever assume the right to regulate the observance of the Sabbath day in the States. If, however, it should ever do so, I do not doubt that the American Congress will protect the American Sabbath day from unnecessary desecration, by whomsoever it is essayed. Nor do I doubt that, if the Supreme Court of the United States should have this question under consideration, it would hold, as my view is, that the Sunday Laws of this Commonwealth are within the police powers of the State, and, moreover, that they in no wise affect interstate commerce, but, being limited in their operations to the State, whatever effect they have upon the through line of transportation outside of the State, it is no more than is proper, and in no way an interference with the granted power of the Congress. It is to be regretted, as it is a federal question, that it cannot go up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and be settled there. Holding the views I do, I am constrained to dissent from the opinion of the majority.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, WESTERN DISTRICT OF MISSOURI.

Mary E. DOZIER

v.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO. of New York.

(46 Fed. Rep. 446.)

Sun-stroke or heat prostration is not a bodily injury "sustained through external, violent and accidental means" within the meaning of an insurance policy covering such injuries, but expressly excluding liability for "any disease or bodily infirmity."

(June 8, 1891.)

ACTION to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance on demurrer to petition. Demurrer sustained.

Statement by Phillips, J.:

This is an action on an accident insurance policy. The assured, Willoughby L. Dozier, on the 26th day of April, 1890, took out a policy of insurance in the defendant Company, which, by its terms, would expire on the 26th day of April, 1891. The assurance was "against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means." It did not cover "any disease or bodily infirmity." The insured was, by occupation, a supervising architect. The petition, by his wife, the named beneficiary, alleges that the assured, while in the discharge of his ordinary avocation, and without any voluntary exposure on his part, came to his death on the 28th day of June, 1890, "by sun-stroke or heat prostration." To this petition the defendant demurs, on the ground that petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it shows on its face that the alleged injury was not accidental, within the meaning of the policy.

There are more of the elements of an accidental nature in sun-stroke than in insanity.

An accident is "an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore not expected; chance, casualty, contingency, happening by chance or unexpectedly; taking place not according to the usual course of things; casual, fortuitous."

The killing of a person by lightning is an accident.

Hutchcraft v. Travelers Ins. Co. 87 Ky. 300.

A stroke of the sun's heat is as unexpected and as accidental to the party who receives it as a stroke of lightning. As at least throwing some light upon the question, see—

Philips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question to be decided is whether or not death resulting from sun-stroke, or heat prostration comes within the means of injury insured against. This precise question does not appear to have been passed upon by any American court, but it is not too much to say, perhaps, that it may be regarded as settled in the negative in England by the opinion of Chief Justice Cockburn in Sinclair v. Maritime Passenger's Assur. Co., 3 El. & El. 478. The policy there assured against "any personal injury from, or by reason or in consequence of, any accident which should happen to him upon any ocean, sea, river, or lake." The assured was master of the ship Sultan, and in the course of his voyage he arrived in the Cochin River, on the southwest coast of India, and in the usual course of his vocation he was smitten by a sun-stroke, from the effect of which he died. On full consideration, it was held that his death must be considered as having resulted from a natural cause, and not from accident, within the meaning of the policy. The policy there did not, as here, contain the words "external, violent," and yet the learned chief justice held that the term "accident," as used in the policy, involved necessarily some violence, casualty, or vis major. He says: "We cannot think disease produced by the action of a known cause can be considered as accidental. Thus disease or death engendered by exposure to heat, cold, damp, the vicissitudes of climate, or atmospheric influences, cannot, we think, properly be said to be accidental, unless, at all events, the exposure is itself brought about by circumstances which may give it the character of accident. Thus, by way of illustration, if, from the effects of ordinary exposure to the elements, such as is common in the course of navigation, a mariner should catch cold and die, such death would not be accidental; although if, being obliged by shipwreck or other disasters to quit the ship, and take to the sea in an open boat, he remained exposed to wet and cold for some time, and death ensued therefrom, the death might properly be held to be the result of accident. It is true that, in one sense, disease or death through the direct effect of a known natural cause, such as we have referred to, may be said to be accidental, inasmuch as it is uncertain beforehand whether the effect will ensue in any particular case. Exposed to the same malaria or infection, one man escapes, another succumbs. Yet diseases thus arising have always been considered, not as accidental, but as proceeding from natural causes. In the present instance, the disease called 'sunstroke,' although the name would at first seem to imply something of external violence, is, so far as we are informed, an inflammatory disease of the brain, brought on by exposure to the too intense heat of the sun's rays. It is a disease to which persons exposing themselves to the sun in a tropical climate are more or less liable, just as persons exposed to the other natural causes to which we have referred are liable to disastrous consequences therefrom. The deceased, in the discharge of his ordinary duties about his ship, became thus affected, and so died."

According to this high authority, a disease produced by a known cause cannot be considered as accidental. This conclusion has been accepted as authoritative by text-writers. Bliss, Ins. § 399; May, Ins. 3d ed. § 519. If sun-stroke or heat prostration is properly classified among diseases, it is expressly excepted from the operation of this policy. It is discussed in works on pathology under the head of diseases of the brain. Niemeyer, in his work on Practical Medicine (vol. 2, pp. 181, 182), treats of it under the head of diseases of the brain. He asserts that the investigations and experiments of so renowned a specialist as Obernier have entirely exploded the once common notion that sun-stroke, or insolation, depends upon hyperæmia of the brain, induced by the action of the sun's rays on the head. The rays of the sun are not essential to it. "It is now known that in this disease there is a serious derangement of the heat-producing function, and a great rise in the bodily temperature, which, in extreme case, may reach 109 degrees or 110 degrees Fahr." And he concludes that, while nothing is yet known of the anatomical lesions upon which sun-stroke depends, yet "the disorder has a definite material basis." A standard Encyclopædia (Britannica, vol. 22, p. 666) terms it a "disease," and prescribes its methods of treatment. From this and other standard works we collate the following facts: That it is a term applied to the effects upon the central nervous system, and through it upon other organs of the body, by exposure to the sun or to overheated air. "Although most frequently observed in tropical regions, this disease also occurs in temperate climates during hot weather. A moist condition of the atmosphere, which interferes with the cooling of the overheated body, greatly increases the liability to suffer from this ailment." The common notion that sun-stroke or "heat prostration," as it is termed in the petition, comes like a stroke of lightning from a piercing ray of the sun, is utterly at fault. It affects persons frequently during the night. It often results from overcrowding in quarters, as in the case of soldiers in barracks, and to persons in poorly ventilated rooms. Also persons whose employment exposes them to heat more or less intense, such as laundry workers and stokers, are apt to suffer from this in hot seasons. "Causes calculated to depress the health, such as previous disease, particularly affections of the nervous system, anxiety, worry or overwork, irregularities in food, and, in a marked degree, intemperance, have a predisposing influence; while personal uncleanness, which prevents, among other things, the healthy action of the skin, the wearing of tight garments, which impede alike the functions of heart and lungs, and living in overcrowded and insanitary dwellings, have an equally hurtful tendency." Longmore, in his reports of cases occurring in the British army in India, where it is quite prevalent, attributes it much to the foul air and badly ventilated quarters, and he also speaks of its pathological conditions. In all its forms, ranging from "heat syncope" and "heat apoplexy" to "ardent thermic fever," it is subjected to medical treatment as a disease, and its fatality is estimated at 40 to 50 per cent. With what propriety for accuracy, therefore, can this malady be termed an accident, any more than cholera, small-pox, or yellow fever, or apoplexy? It may be an accident that a person is exposed to it, but the conditions under which the human system may be affected by it certainly belong to natural causes, which may reasonably be anticipated, as they come not by chance. The "accident," as used in the policy, is presumed to be employed in its ordinary, popular sense, which means "happening by chance;" "unexpectedly taking place;" "not according to the usual course of things." So that a result ordinarily, naturally, flowing from the conduct of the party cannot be said to be accidental, even where he may not have foreseen the consequences.

It is not deemed essential to a vindication of the correctness of the conclusion reached to review the various American decisions illustrating the application of the term "accidental" employed in such policies further than to note the palpable distinction between them and the case at bar. Death by drowning is accidental, as there is present the vis major, external and violent, producing asphyxia, and in the act producing the injury there is something unforeseen, unexpected, and unusual. May, Ins. § 516.

In United States Acc. Assn. v. Barry, 181 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, the assured, after two other persons had jumped from a platform five feet from the ground with safety, also jumped therefrom, followed, as to him, with serious consequences, producing a stricture of the duodenum, from which death ensued. In that case the deceased intended to, and thought that he would, alight safely, and it was a question for the jury to say whether or not it was an accident that he did not. The court says: "If the death is such as follows from ordinary means voluntarily employed in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means; but if in the act which precedes the injury something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual occurs, which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted through accidental means."

In United States Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Newman, 84 Va. 52, the assured was found dead in his bed in the morning, caused evidently by inhaling coal gas. The case turned upon the question whether or not this gas was a poison or poisonous substance, within the meaning of the exception contained in the policy. The controversy among the experts was as to whether death resulted from carbonic oxide or carbonic acid, and as to their resultant poisonous power, both causing death by suffocation. Such a death clearly came within the term "accidental," and it was left to the jury to determine whether or not carbonic oxide is poisonous within the meaning and intent of the words "poison" and "poisonous" as used in the policy. This course was pursued by the court in view of the conflict in the testimony as to whether such gases were strictly "poisonous" in the ordinary acceptance to be imputed to such term in the policy. These cases do not present the question of an accident, and disease as in the case at bar. In Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn., 123 N. Y. 304, it was held that death resulting from a malignant pustule, caused by the infliction upon the body of diseased animal matter containing bacillus anthrax, is death from disease, and not within the terms of an accident policy similar to the one under consideration. It was likened to what is called "wool sorter's disease," because it happens to people who handle wool and hides, such as tanners, butchers and herdsmen. Although the medical experts admitted that this species of malady belonged to pathology, yet they attempted to except this instance from the classification of disease by defining it as a "pathological condition, and succumbing of the body to the infliction of this particular poison." But the court held that a pathological condition "means neither more nor less than a diseased condition of the body," and therefore, as the policy expressly excepted bodily infirmity or disease, there could be no recovery. The court says: "No abrasion of the skin is needed to produce the contact of the bacilli, and what follows from such contact seem to be as plainly a disease as in the case of small-pox or typhoid fever."

Sun-stroke seems to be recognized by the courts in New York as a disease. In Boos v. World Mut. L. Ins. Co., 6 Thomp. & C. 364, the contention was as to whether the court should take judicial cognizance of the fact that sun-stroke was "a serious disease," within the terms of the policy. There seemed to be no question made that it was not a disease, but whether the fact of its seriousness should be left to the determination of the jury. Courts may take cognizance of facts generally known and recognized in nature, science and history. They will take notice of processes in art and science, the results of which are matters of common knowledge. Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 87, 28 L. ed. 200. They will take notice of the art of photography, and its production of correct likenesses. Underbrook's Case, 76 Pa. 340; Cozens v. Higgins, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 451. Also, that coal oil is inflammable. State v. Hayes, 78 Mo. 818.

So should courts take notice that fever in its multiform grades is a disease, and I apprehend, in view of the universal assignment of apoplexy in pathology among the diseases of the brain, that it would not be seriously questioned that courts in trials before juries may assume it to be a bodily disease.

It is suggested in argument by the learned counsel for plaintiff that at some time anterior to the issuance of this policy the defendant's policies contained an express exception against injury by sun-stroke, and that in its circulars distributed at the time the policy in question was issued it asserted that practically all the old conditions had been expunged from its policies. It is therefore argued that this was tantamount to an assurance on its part that sun-stroke would thenceforth be regarded by it as expressed within the terms "external, violent and accidental." What the facts are touching this assertion the court cannot know, and what the law arising thereon may be the court is not required on this issue to say, as no such facts appear in the petition. The court can look alone to the petition in passing on the demurrer. The demurrer admits only such facts as appear on the face of the petition, and such as are well pleaded.

It results that the demurrer is sustained.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Samuel D. HELFRICH, Appt.,
v.

CATONSVILLE WATER CO.

(....Md.....)

The right of the owner of land bordering on a stream to use it as a pasture in a reasonable way is not affected by the fact that the waters are thereby made unfit for use, although the water-works of an incorporated company have been established lower down to supply the public with water from that stream.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County enjoining him from permitting cows or other animals to enter or stand in, or defoul the waters of, a stream from which plaintiff supplied the inhabitants of Catonsville with water for domestic purposes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Irving, Robinson, Bryan, Briscoe, Miller, Fowler and McSherry, JJ.

NOTE.—Pollution of waters.

A person has a right to use a stream as it passes through his lands for all reasonable purposes, and in the manner in which such streams are usually enjoyed. Carhart v. Auburn Gas Light Co. 22 Barb. 307, 308; Radcliff v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 202; Thomas v. Brackney, 17 Barb. 664, 666-669; O'Riley v. McChesney, 8 Lans. 278; Snow v. Parsons, 28 Vt. 459, 461-463; Pitts v. Lancaster Mills, 18 Met. 156; Cary v. Daniels, 8 Met. 470, 477; Jacobs v. Alford, 42 Vt. 308.

The question whether his use of the stream is a reasonable one, under the circumstances, is one of fact. O'Riley v. McChesney, supra; Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159; Tremain v. Cohoes County, Id. 163; Thomas v. Brackney, supra; Honsee v. Hammond, 39 Barb. 89; Sampson v. Hoddinott, 38 Eng. L. & Eq. 241; Merritt v. Brinkerhoff, 17 Johns. 306; Pollitt v. Long, 58 Barb. 20; Crosley v. Lightowler, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 478; McCallum v. Germantown Water Co. 54 Pa. 40; Crosby v. Bessey, 49 Me. 539; Marley v. Shults, 29 N. Co.* 14 N. J. Eq. 385.

The question whether a particular use of the water of a stream by one owner is consistent with the rights of other owners on the stream below is generally one of fact for a jury. In the absence of a right by prescription or grant the test is whether the particular use, under the circumstances, is a reasonable one (Prentice v. Geiger, 74 N. Y. 841); As such owner has the right to enjoy the continued flow of the stream, to use its force, and to 18 L. R. A.

make limited and temporary appropriation of its waters. These rights are held in common with all others having lands bordering upon the same stream; but his enjoyment must necessarily be according to his opportunity, prior to those below him, subsequent to those above. It follows that all such rights are liable to be modified and abridged in their enjoyment by the exercise by others of their own rights; and, so far as they are thus abridged, the loss is damnum absque injuria. The only limit that can be set to this abridgment through the exercise by others of their natural rights is in the standard or measure of reasonable use. Gould v. Boston Duck Co. 13 Gray, 442; Haskins v. Haskins, 9 Gray, 390; Tourtillot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370, 376; Thurber v. Martin, 2 Gray, 394; Pitts v. Lancaster Mills, 18 Met. 156; *Wadsworth v. The riparian owners of lands adjoining fresh water, non-navigable streams, take title, ad usque flum aquæ (to the thread of the stream), and thereby acquire the right as incident to such title to the usufructuary enjoyment of the undiminished and undisturbed flow of such water. "Fresh rivers of what kind soever do of common right belong to the owners of the soil adjacent," is the expressive language of the common law, and is of universal application. *Clinton v. Messrs. Edwin J. Farber and John I. Yellott, for appellee:

The appellee, as riparian owner along the stream in question, claims the right to have the water come to it in its pure and natural condition.

By an irreparable injury is meant one for which there is no adequate remedy at law.

The appellee cannot commit, or permit any act to be committed, in his user of the water, which will amount to a public nuisance.

Why should the appellee be forced to obtain by condemnation that which it already has a right to without it, to wit: The right to pure water, which the appellant seeks to deprive appellee of by his action or the action of his cattle, whose nuisances he can easily obviate or guard against?

Lewis v. Stein, 16 Ala. 214.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Catonsville Water Company was incorporated by the Act of 1886, chap. 100. It was chartered for the purpose of enabling it to supply with pure water the inhabitants of Catonsville and the adjoining portion of Baltimore County. In pursuance of its charter, it has acquired a tract of land, and constructed at large expense a dam and reservoir, water-works, mains, and pipes, and is engaged in supplying a large number of people with water for drinking and other necessary purposes. A pure, clear, natural stream of fresh water flows through and along the land of Samuel D. Helfrich, and through the land of the Water Company, which is situate about 140 perches further down the stream, and is the principal source of supply for the purposes of the Company's business.

A bill of complaint was filed by the Water Company, on the equity side of the Circuit Court of Baltimore County, in which it was alleged that Helfrich permitted a large number of his cows to enter said stream and stand therein, and that they dropped their excrement, dung, and filth into its waters, and greatly polluted and befouled them; and that in consequence of such deposits, when the stream flowed through the Water Company's land and supplied its works, the purity of the water was greatly impaired, and it was rendered unhealthy and unfit for drinking purposes. On these grounds an injunction was prayed and granted restraining Helfrich from permitting cows or other animals to enter or stand in the stream, and to drop or deposit therein any excrement, dung, or filth, or in any manner to pollute or befoul it. The injunction, as granted, also prohibited the erection of a hydraulic ram; but, as we shall see, this question is not now presented by the record. After answer and testimony, the court, on final hearing, made the injunction perpetual so far as it related to the pollution of the stream, and dissolved it as to the erection of the hydraulic ram. The defendant appealed to this court.

Helfrich's lot is on the south side of the Frederick Turnpike, about one mile west of the Village of Catonsville, and about half a mile from the Water Company's property. The lot has been used by the owner as a pasture for his cows, and, so far as the evidence shows, it seems to be well adapted for such a purpose, being well provided with shade, grass, and water. Helfrich, at the time the injunction was issued, owned six cows, and it appears that he used his lot for the purpose of pasturing them in the way a proprietor, under ordinary circumstances, might reasonably use his own property. The question seems to be whether his rights have been in any way abridged or diminished by the incorporation of the Water Company and the construction of its works.

The rights of riparian owners are well understood, and there is a general concurrence of opinion in the courts as to the manner in which they must be exercised. The law on this subject is strictly in accord with the common sense and general convenience of mankind. The owner of land has a right to the use of a stream of water which flows through it for all useful and reasonable purposes. This use is not an easement, but is an incident to his property in the soil: a necessary, inherent, and inseparable portion of his ownership. But there is an equality of right in other riparian owners above and below him on the same stream; and, from the necessary conditions of the case, they must not use the water to the prejudice of each other's rights. Hence difficult questions frequently arise; not as to the ascertainment of the principle of decision, but as to its application to interests which are in collision. It is laid down in general terms that every owner has the right to enjoy the stream of water which flows through his land in its natural state, without diminution to its flow, quantity, or purity. It is also held with like generality of statement, that any defilement or corruption of the water which prevents its use for any of its reasonable or proper purposes is an infringement of the rights of riparian owners which will entitle them to a remedy suited to the nature of the case.

But all abstract rules are subject to considerable modification when they are applied to the exigencies of human life. The right to the use of a stream of water in its natural purity cannot override other co-equal and co-existing rights; it must certainly yield to those of a more absolute and unqualified character. The tillage of the soil and the tending of flocks and herds were the earliest occupations of the human race. The husbandman soweth his seed and gathereth the harvest to furnish us with food; and the flocks and herds bring forth their increase for our use. It would be most unnatural and unwise to put any unnecessary restrictions on those pursuits which furnish the world with the means of subsistence. We must confess that the right of a man to cultivate his own fields, and to pasture his cattle on his own land, is of an original and primary character, and that it would be oppressive to interfere with the free exercise of it, except under a necessity caused by grave public considerations. The washings from cultivated fields might, and probably would, carry soil and manure into streams of water, and make them muddy and impure. And so the habits of cattle according to their natural instincts would lead them to stand in the water and befoul the stream. But, nevertheless, the owners of the land must not lose the beneficial use of it. The inconveniences which arise from the pollution of the water by these causes must be borne by those who suffer from them. The ordinary requirements of domestic life diminish the purity of the atmosphere; but as long as these causes are within the limits of reason and necessity the law recognizes no ground of complaint against them. The reasonable and proper exercise of acknowledged right by one man may, and often does, work annoyance and loss to another; but rights cannot be forfeited for this reason.

So far as we can see from the record, there was nothing unreasonable or unusual in the way in which the cattle were pastured in this lot. If Helfrich had wantonly or recklessly befouled the water of the stream, or had harassed the Water Company or injured its business by an immoderate and excessive exercise of his acknowledged rights, he would justly have been responsible for his conduct. But nothing of this kind can be justly attributed to him. He seems to have used his pasture as all men, time out of mind, have done in like cases. We are not unmindful of the vast number of cases where persons have been enjoined from committing nuisances in running streams, and from depositing or permitting to be deposited in them noxious, deleterious, or unwholesome matter, and from any unlawful or unreasonable thing which impairs the legitimate use of the water by riparian owners. Nor have we overlooked the numerous cases where it has been held that certain kinds of manufacturing establishments have infringed the vested rights of such owners. Our opinion is placed on the distinct ground that Helfrich was using his pasture lot in a reasonable manner, and that he had a right so to use it. His right was not in any way abridged by the incorporation of the Water Company and the establishment of its works. And it was not in the power of the Legislature to abridge it. It is a right of property protected by the declaration of rights. The Water Company has power, under its charter, to acquire the water-right by making due compensation to the owner, and not otherwise.

The decree of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the bill of complaint dismissed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Ex Parte W. P. HURN.

(....Ala.....)

1. Mandamus cannot be issued to compel a court to hear and determine a motion which it has already overruled.
2. Money can be taken from a prisoner under arrest only when there is probable ground for believing that it is connected with the offense charged or may be used as evidence on his trial.
3. An officer may be garnished for money which he has taken from the debtor under arrest where a statute makes property in his hands subject to legal process, if the arrest was made in good faith and there is probable ground for believing the money to be connected with the offense or useful as evidence on the trial of the prisoner.

NOTE.—Mandamus defined.

The writ of mandamus is a remedy to compel any person, corporation, public functionary, or tribunal to perform some duty required by law, where the party seeking relief has no legal remedy, and the duty sought to be enforced is clear and indisputable. Knox County Comrs. v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 589, 16 L. ed. 308.

The office of the writ is to compel action—the doing of something which the public or some person is interested in having done, and which it is the duty of some other person to do; and it cannot be used as a preventive remedy. Legg v. Annapolis, 42 Md. 208.

The writ of mandamus is only issued to prevent a failure of justice, and where there is no other clear and adequate remedy to enforce the performance of the duty. Arrington v. Van Houton, 44 Ala. 284; State v. Guerrero, 12 Nev. 106; Reading v. Com. 11 Pa. 196; Com. v. Allegheny County Comrs. 16 Serg. & R. 317; Fitch v. McDiarmid, 28 Ark. 482; State v. McCrillus, 4 Kan. 260; Runion v. Latimer, 6 S. C. 126; Rice, Colo. Code Proc. § 307.

Its issuance is discretionary.

The writ of mandamus is a prerogative writ resting in the sound discretion of the court. Such a discretionary power will not be exercised by the court to accomplish injustice and wrong. Tapping, Mandamus, chap. 2, ¶5.

Though the granting or refusal of the writ of mandamus is said to be discretionary as distinguished from a writ of right, it is not an absolute or arbitrary discretion, but is controlled by well-defined legal rules, and its exercise is reviewable in this court. People v. Syracuse Common Council, 78 N. Y. 56; People v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 197, 103 N. Y. 95.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the Montgomery City Court to hear and determine a motion made to procure the restoration to movant of certain money which had been removed from his person by an officer who arrested him on a criminal charge. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Moore & Finley for petitioner.

Messrs. Lomax & Tyson, for respondent:

Mandamus is not the proper remedy in this case, because the facts show that the respondent did hear and determine the motion, and the petitioner has an adequate remedy by appeal.

Money in possession of the defendant in attachment may be levied on, if the levy can be made without a trespass.

Barnett v. Bass, 10 Ala. 951; 1 Wade,

The writ shall not be issued in any case where there is a plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. It shall be issued upon petition and affidavit on the application of the party beneficially interested. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1096; N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2067.

When mandamus will not lie.

Mandamus is the appropriate remedy to set the machinery of the courts to which it is addressed in motion, but it will not direct the performance of any particular judicial act. The subordinate tribunal will be left free to give its best judgment. The scope and province of the writ is to prevent a failure of justice from delay or refusal to act, when addressed to a court acting judicially. State v. Lafayette County Ct. 41 Mo. 222; Trainer v. Porter, 46 Mo. 338.

Nor will it lie to correct the errors of inferior tribunals by annulling what they have done erroneously. Dunklin v. Dunklin County Dist. Ct. 23 Mo. 453; Ex parte Koon, 1 Denio, 644; People v. Judges of Dutchess C. P. 20 Wend. 658; Chase v. Blackstone Canal Co. 10 Pick. 244.

Mandamus will not lie to compel an inferior court to declare an election void (State v. Judge of 9th Judicial Circuit, 13 Ala. 806); or to vacate an order suppressing a deposition (Ex parte Elston, 25 Ala. 72); or to compel a judge of a district court to try a cause transferred by him to the circuit court (Francisco v. Manhattan Ins. Co. 36 Cal. 288); or to compel a judge to sign a bill of exceptions, which is not in accordance with his judgment of the facts (Shepard v. Peyton, 12 Kan. 618; People v. Jameson, 40 Ill. 93; Jamison v. Reed, 3 G. Greene, 394; State v. Noggle, 13 Wis. 880); or to compel a court to correct errors of judgment by annulling what they have done, or to guide their discretion (Dunklin v. Dunk-

Attachm. § 261; Dolby v. Mullins, 8 Humph. 437, 39 Am. Dec. 180.

And by statute in Alabama, such money in the hands of a sheriff or other officer is subject to attachment.

Code 1886, § 2950; Fruitt v. Armstrong, 56 Ala. 306; 2 Wade, Attachm. p. 347.

The arresting officer had the right to search his prisoner and take the money from him; this being true, the separation of said money from the person of Hurn, the petitioner, was legal, and there was no trespass committed, and if the money was found in the possession of the sheriff after such legal separation, it was liable to attachment or garnishment.

Chastong v. State, 83 Ala. 29; Terry v. State, 90 Ala. 635; 1 Wade, Attachm. § 130; Closon v. Morrison, 47 N. H. 432; Spaulding v. Preston, 21 Vt. 9; Drake, Attachm. 6th ed. 193; Reifensnyder v. Lee, 44 Iowa, 101.

Motion made prior to return term of the writs of attachment and garnishment, addressed to the discretion of the court, was not the proper procedure, and was premature.

Ala. Code 1886, §§ 2929-2973, 2994, 2990, 2991, 2992, 2993. See also Matthews v. Ansley, 31 Ala. 20.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner, Hurn, having been arrested on the criminal charge of fraudulently obtaining goods on a credit, was searched by the officer making the arrest, who took from him $1,124.40 found concealed in his clothing. The prisoner and the money were delivered to the sheriff of the county. An attachment, having been sued out against the defendant, Hurn, was placed in the hands of the sheriff, and by him levied upon the money in his possession. This was followed by a writ of garnishment executed by the coroner of the county upon the sheriff. The attachment and garnishment suits were made returnable to the City Court of Montgomery. The sheriff, as garnishee, filed his answer, setting up the facts and circumstances under which he came in possession of the money, paid the money into the court, and prayed "that all proper issues and orders be made up under the direction of the court, in order that it might be ascertained to whom the money should be paid."

The defendant Hurn moved the court for an order that the money be restored to him, "upon the grounds that his person had been searched in violation of law, and the money wrongfully, illegally, and violently taken from his person." The suit by attachment, and upon which the garnishment issued, was still pending and undisposed of at the hearing of the motion. The court refused to permit movant to introduce affidavits in support of the facts stated in his petition, and made the following order: "April 14, 1891. Motion overruled, (1) because the court is without jurisdiction; (2) because the facts set out in the motion present an issue to be decided by the jury in the trial of the attachment suit." From this order overruling the motion, the petitioner applies to this court for a mandamus "upon the grounds that the court refused to hear and determine the motion," etc.

In Ex parte Redd, 73 Ala. 549, it was declared that the coercive process of mandamus is proper when an inferior court refuses to proceed to judgment in a case in which the lin County Dist. Ct. 23 Mo. 449; or to do an act lying entirely within its discretion (Sinnickson v. Corwine, 28 N. J. L. 311; Louisville v. Kean, 18 B. Mon. 9); or to secure a revision of the judgment of the court. Little v. Morris, 10 Tex. 233; People v. Judge of Detroit Sup. Ct. 32 Mich. 190.

Where a judge has determined that under the statutes of the State he is disqualified from hearing a cause, a mandamus does not lie to make him reverse that decision and to hear the cause. State v. Van Ness, 15 Fla. 317.

Some of the decisions in the foregoing cases rested upon the ground that there was other specific and adequate remedy for the relator, which is always, as we have seen, sufficient to defeat an application for a mandamus. On this ground a mandamus will always be refused. Ex parte Newman, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 152, 20 L. ed. 877; Mansfield v. Fuller, 50 Mo. 383. See 4 Watt, Act. and Def. 373.

Mandamus will not control the discretion of public officers. Dalton v. State, 1 West. Rep. 733, 43 Ohio St. 652; State v. Shaw, 1 West. Rep. 221, note, 43 Ohio St. 324; People v. Knickerbocker, 1 West. Rep. 375, 114 Ill. 539; Deobert v. Com. 4 Cent. Rep. 700, 113 Pa. 229.

It will not lie to compel the performance of duties or acts necessarily calling for the exercise of judgment and discretion. State v. Police Jury, 39 La. Ann. 759.

Even though the judgment is plainly erroneous, the subordinate court having passed upon the question pending before it, its decision, if erroneous, is a judicial error, which is not the province of a mandamus to correct. Judges of Oneida C. P. v. People, 15 Wend. 79; Carliaga v. Dryden, 29 Cal. 307; Ex parte Whitney, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 404, 10 L. ed. 221; 13 L. R. A.

Warren County Ct. v. Daniel, 2 Bibb, 573; Stout v. Hopping, 17 N. J. L. 471; Reg v. Blanshard, 13 Q. B. 318; Foster v. Redfield, 50 Vt. 235; Ex parte Koon, 1 Denio, 644; Ex parte Ostrander, Id. 679.

Nor will it be granted to reverse the decisions of inferior courts upon matters properly within their judicial cognizance. Bank of Columbia v. Sweeney, 28 U. S. 1 Pet. 537, 7 L. ed. 255; Ex parte DeGroot, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 497, 18 L. ed. 887; Ex parte Newman, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 152, 20 L. ed. 877; Ex parte Perry, 109 U. Todd*, 73 Mo. 101; Williams v. Judge of Cooper County C. P. 27 Mo. 225; Blecker v. St. Louis Law Comr. 30 Mo. 111.

While the writ is sometimes granted to compel the allowance of an appeal, it will not lie to compel subordinate courts to reinstate appeals which they have dismissed. Such dismissal, whether made in accordance with a rule of practice of the inferior court not unlawful in itself, or done in the exercise of a judicial discretion, is held equally beyond control by mandamus, and the party aggrieved will be left to his writ of error. Sinnickson v. Corwine, 28 N. J. L. 311; Wells v. Stackhouse, 17 N. J. L. 355; Com. v. Philadelphia County Judges, C. P. 3 Binn. 273. But see, contra, Freas v. Jones, 16 N. J. L. 358; *Adams v. law makes it his duty to act. This court compels judgment, but will not control it. In Ex parte Schmidt, 82 Ala. 254, it was held that the writ would lie to compel the execution of ministerial duties in all proper cases, but would not be awarded to order or direct what judgment shall be rendered in any given case; nor can its powers be invoked to correct any error in the final judgment or decree of an inferior court. In such cases there is an adequate remedy by appeal. Ex parte Echols, 39 Ala. 700; Ex parte State Bar Assn. (Ala.) 2 L. R. A. 134.

In the case of petitioner, the court overruled the motion. The motion has been disposed of by judicial action of the court. Whether the court erred in the order overruling the motion, or in not receiving in evidence the affidavits offered in support of the petition, or whether the reasons assigned by the court for overruling the motion are sufficient, cannot be reviewed on an application for the writ of mandamus. Such questions are revisable only by appeal. The remedy by appeal seems to have been resorted to in the cases cited by appellant. Both parties have argued the case upon its merits, and in view of such intimation from counsel, it may not be improper to consider the real question involved in the case. It is the law that the levy of an attachment procured by trickery, fraud, or trespass will be held to be invalid, and the officer who makes a levy by such means exposes himself to an action in damages. Waples, Attachm. 180. An officer cannot forcibly take property from the person of a defendant, and if a levy is effected by force, fraud, or violence of any kind, it is generally held void. 1 Wade, Attachm. § 130; Mack v. Parks, 8 Gray, 517; Folmar v. Copeland, 57 Ala. 589; Street v. Sinclair, 71 Ala. 110.

In Drake on Attachment (§ 506) it is said: "An officer, under criminal process against a person, arrested and took from him money and property found in his possession. The officer was summoned to answer as garnishee of the prisoner. It was held that the officer was exempt from garnishment."

The text here quoted from Drake on Attachment refers to two decisions from Massachusetts: Robinson v. Howard, 7 Cush. 257, and Morris v. Penniman, 14 Gray, 220. An examination of these decisions shows that they were based upon a statute of the State which provided that no person should be adjudged a trustee "by reason of any money in his hands as a public officer, and for which he is accountable to the defendant as such officer." In another section of the Massachusetts Code it is declared that money collected by the sheriff by force of legal process in favor of the defendant in the trustee process could not be reached by trustee proceedings. These statutes have been brought forward, and may be found in the Massachusetts Statutes of 1882 (p. 1055). The case of Zurcher v. Magee, 2 Ala. 253, is to the same effect as the Massachusetts decisions holding money in the hands of the sheriff, collected by him, to be "in the custody of the law. Since the decision in 2 Ala., supra, was rendered, the law has been changed by statute (Code 1886, 13 L. R. A.

§ 2950), and now money in the hands of the sheriff or other officer may be attached, and as was held in Pruitt v. Armstrong, 56 Ala. 310, the law as declared in 2 Ala. no longer prevails. The law as cited from Drake, supra, and the cases cited from Massachusetts, being based upon a statute of that State different from the statute of this State, cannot be regarded as authority upon the question.

The case of Closson v. Morrison, 47 N. H. 488, is very much in point. In that case the deputy-sheriff, having arrested the plaintiff on a complaint for larceny, searched him, and took from his person a watch and chain and money; and on the next day, while this money was in his possession, it was attached by the party who had made the criminal charge, and also by another creditor. The New Hampshire statute provides that "any officer who shall find any implement, article, or thing, kept, used, or designed to be used in violation of law, or in the commission of any offense, in the possession of or belonging to any person arrested, or liable to be arrested, for such offense or violation of law, shall bring such implement, article, or thing before the justice or court having jurisdiction of the offense, who shall make such order respecting their custody or destruction as justice may require." The court held that a due regard for his own safety on the part of the officer, and also for the public safety, would justify a search and seizure of any deadly weapon he might find upon the prisoner, and hold them until he was discharged, or otherwise properly disposed of, and further held the sheriff might seize any money or other articles of value found upon the prisoner, by means of which, if left in his possession, he might procure his escape, or obtain tools or implements or weapons with which to effect his escape. The court further held that the validity of the attachment depended upon the bona fides or the mala fides of the search and seizure of the property; that, if this was done in order to effect a levy, it would be invalid; but if done with a due regard to the public safety, and to secure the safety of the prisoner only, then the separation of the property from the person of the defendant was lawful, and it would then be subject to attachment as property not found upon the person. Whether it was bona fide or not was a question for the jury, under all the evidence.

In the case of Spaulding v. Preston, 21 Vt. 9, the sheriff arrested one Russell on a charge of counterfeiting, and took from his person a lot of German silver, and held it under the order of the state attorney. He was sued by one Preston, who claimed to be the owner of the property by purchase. The court (Redfield, J.) held that the sheriff was not liable for a trespass. Much is said in this opinion not applicable to the case at bar, and is cited as an authority as to the right and duty of the sheriff to search and take from a prisoner property found on his person. In Waples on Attachment and Garnishment (p. 181) the principle is laid down that, if the plaintiff in attachment is not an instigator or co-worker with the officer in obtaining an unauthorized and illegal levy, he ought not to lose the benefit of an attachment, and that the circumstances of each particular case must determine whether the official wrongdoing was such as to invalidate the levy.

In the case of Gile v. Derens, 11 Cush. 61, 3, the court recognized the distinction in cases where unlawful means were used for the purpose of seizing the property, and the seizure was effected by those means, and in cases where the levy was in no way connected with or effected through the unlawful act of the officer. In Hitchcock v. Holmes, 43 Conn. 528, the court recognized the rule that a levy could not be effected by a trespass, but held that an officer with a writ of attachment in his possession, who was invited by a servant, not knowing the purpose of the officer in calling, to enter a dwelling-house, was lawfully in, and authorized to make a levy upon such household goods as were liable to satisfy the attachment.

In the case of Pomroy v. Parmlee, 9 Iowa, 140, the facts as stated in the opinion were as follows: Plaintiffs sued out a warrant in Scott County upon a criminal charge against the defendant, and, at or about the same time, a writ of attachment. The sheriff, with E. S. Pomroy and a deputy, followed the defendant, and overtook him in Poweshiek County, and there arrested him, and took possession and control of a trunk of the defendant, and, against the objection of the defendant carried the defendant and the trunk back to Scott County. After getting back to Scott County, where the sheriff was authorized to levy the attachment, it was levied upon $1,089 of money found in the trunk. The court held that it was settled that a valid seizure, service, or execution cannot be obtained through means rendered unlawful by fraud or violence. That, "under the shadow of the criminal process, the name and pretense of a civil writ was used to bring the property to a place where the letter might be levied upon it." It is clear that the court concluded from the facts in this case that the criminal process was used for the purpose of effecting a levy, and, in accordance with the general principle that a levy effected by fraud or violence will not be upheld, declared that the attachment, if thus obtained, was illegal.

In the case of Reifsnnyder v. Lee, 44 Iowa, 101, the facts were that Lee had stolen five head of cattle, and sold them to the plaintiff for $162. The owner recovered the cattle, and plaintiff had Lee arrested for the larceny, and the officer making the arrest took from his person both money and a watch. Plaintiff then sued Lee, and had the officer who held possession of the property garnished. The defendant, Lee, moved the court to discharge the garnishee, and dissolve the attachment, on the ground that the money and the watch were unlawfully and forcibly taken from him. The trial court granted the motion; and, on appeal, the supreme court held that the object of the pursuit and capture of Lee was not to obtain possession of the money and watch in order to subject it to legal process, but for the purpose of bringing him to punishment for his crime. The conclusion of the court was that the money and watch were lawfully taken from the possession of Lee, and, being rightfully in the possession of the officer, were subject to the process of garnishment. The court declared, in this case, it was usual and proper for officers, upon the arrest of felons, to subject them to search, and take from them articles found upon their persons, and suggested, as an additional thought, "that there was ample ground for holding that the money taken from Lee was the money received from the sale of the cattle." The principles of law declared in this case are directly applicable to the facts of the present case, but this decision seems to have been materially qualified by a later decision in the same State, in the case of Commercial Exch. Bank v. McLeod, reported in 65 Iowa, 666.

The Code of Iowa (§ 4212) provides: "He who makes an arrest may take from the person all offensive weapons which he may have about his person, and must deliver them to the magistrate before whom he is taken, to be disposed of according to law." In construing this section of the Code, the court held that the officer making the arrest was not precluded thereby from taking from the person of the prisoner other property than "offensive weapons," but that he might search him and take from him all property which might be used by the prisoner in effecting his escape. The court held, however, in this latter case (65 Iowa, 666), that if the money and property found on the prisoner had no connection with the arrest or the crime charged, and was not to be used as evidence in the prosecution, "the personal possession of the sheriff should be regarded as the personal possession of the prisoner, and the money and property should be no more liable to attachment than if it was in the prisoner's pocket;" and, on an application for rehearing, the court re-affirmed that "the possession of the officer was the possession of the defendant,—citing, in support of the principle: 1 Archb. Crim. Pl. 34, 35; Wharton, Crim. Pl. § 61; 1 Bishop, Crim. Prnc. §§ 210-212, and Patterson v. Pratt, 19 Iowa, 358. We have been unable to find the reference in 1 Archb. Crim. Pl. sustaining the proposition. In Wharton, Crim. Pl., supra, § 60, it is declared: "Those arresting a defendant are bound to take from his person any articles which may be of use as proof in the trial of the offense with which the defendant is charged. These articles are properly to be deposited with the committing magistrate, to be retained by him, with the other evidence in the cause, until returned to the prosecuting officers of the State. They should carefully be preserved for the purposes of the trial, and after its close be returned to the person whose property they lawfully are." Section 61: "The right of the arresting officer to remove money from the defendant's person is limited to those cases in which the money is connected with the offense with which the defendant is charged. Any wider license would be a violation of his personal rights. When money is taken in violation of this rule the court will order its restoration to the defendant. That where property is identified as stolen, or is in any way valuable as proof, it may be sequestrated, is plain." 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc., §§ 210, 211, is to the same effect, and in section 212 it is stated that the officer "holds all such property, whether money or goods, subject to the order of the court, and in proper circumstances he will be directed to restore it, in whole or in part, to the prisoner." Both these authorities, it will be seen, limit the right to take money from the prisoner to cases in which the money is in some way connected with the offense charged, or to be used as evidence on the prosecution. Whether the officer would be held guilty of a trespass if, on the trial, it appeared that the officer was mistaken in believing that the money was connected with the offense, or material as evidence, is not stated; or whether the money, while in the possession of the officer, was subject to attachment at the suit of creditors, is not discussed or declared.

The common-law rule declared by Wharton and Bishop, supra, seems to conflict with the state decisions which we have quoted, in so far as they declare it to be the duty of the arresting officer to search and take from the person of the prisoner money or other property which might be available in effecting his escape. It is stated by Mr. Wharton, and sustained by his references, that at common law, "if the property is identified as stolen, or is in any way valuable as proof, it may be sequestrated, is nevertheless plain." If, under this rule, the property is sequestrated, or deposited in court, or held by the officer, to be used as proof on the trial, and, while thus held, a creditor attaches it, what are the rights of the attaching creditor? At common law, and perhaps without statute, the money or property would be in gremio legis, not subject to attachment, and entirely under the control of the court. After the prosecution is ended, at common law, the court could and ought to direct "that it be restored, in whole or in part, to the prisoner, according to the circumstances." In many States, property thus held was regarded in gremio legis, and therefore not subject to attachment. See 2 Ala., supra, and authorities cited. We understand this to be the reason and extent of the rule as declared by Bishop and Wharton.

The facts of the case of Patterson v. Pratt, 19 Iowa, 358, are as follows: One Dunn, having lost $200, sued out a search-warrant against Pratt. Under this warrant, Pratt was arrested, and $485.12 found on his person, which was taken from him and delivered to the magistrate. While the money was in the hands of the justice of the peace, the plaintiff, Patterson, had it levied on by the sheriff to satisfy an execution in his favor, and also summoned the justice to answer as garnishee. The garnishee paid the money to the clerk of the court. The statute of Iowa in regard to garnishing money or a fund in the hands of an officer, or in court, is very similar to section 2950 of this State. The court (Dillon, J.) held: "The appellant argues that the statute contemplates a fund which has come into court legitimately by civil process, or by consent of the execution debtor. In our opinion, a fund may properly find its way into court without the consent or volition of the party from whom it was obtained. . . . Persons may not unwarrantably make use of the machinery of criminal law to accomplish private ends.

But we see no evidence of the abuse of the law, in the case at bar, by any party, much less by the appellee. . . . It is not shown that this was a scheme between Dunn and appellee to get hold of the money of the appellant. The charge against Pratt is not shown to have been false or fabricated." After distinctly recognizing the principle declared in Isley v. Nichols, 12 Pick. 270, and other authorities, that "no lawful thing procured upon a wrongful act can be supported," held that the fund was lawfully in court, and subject to garnishment.

Upon principle, property subject to the payment of a debt may be levied upon by the proper officer, if the levy can be effected without trickery or fraud, or a trespass calculated to provoke a breach of the peace. Barnett v. Bass, 10 Ala. 954, and authorities supra. The garnishment in this case was regularly executed by the coroner upon the sheriff, who had possession of the money. There is no evidence to show that the defendant was arrested for the purpose of obtaining a levy, or that the criminal charge against him was false or fabricated. The important question, then, is, Was the sheriff authorized to search the defendant, and take from his person the money, either for the purpose of using it as evidence on the criminal prosecution, or to prevent the prisoner from using the money to effect his escape?

Our Statute (Code, § 4745) provides: "When a person charged with a felony is supposed by the magistrate before whom he is brought to have upon his person a dangerous weapon, or anything which may be used as evidence of the commission of the offense, the magistrate may direct him to be searched in his presence, and such weapon or other thing be retained, subject to the order of court in which the defendant may be tried." Section 4212 of the Code of Iowa provides that "he who makes the arrest may take from the person all offensive weapons which he may have on his person." It was held in the latter State that this section did not preclude the sheriff from taking from his person money or other property which might be used in effecting an escape. The Supreme Court of the State of New Hampshire, construing a somewhat similar statute, we have seen, declared the same rule; and the duty and right of the sheriff in this respect has been recognized in other States. The Constitution of the State of Alabama (art. 1, § 6) provides "that the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions from unreasonable seizures or searches; and that no warrant shall issue to search any place, or to seize any person or thing, without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation."

In commenting on article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures, in the case of Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion, quoted with approbation from Lord Camden, as follows: "By the laws of England, every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute, is a trespass. No man can set his foot upon my ground without my license, but he is liable to an action, though the damage be nothing. . . . If he admits the fact, he is bound to show, by way of justification, that some positive law has justified or excused him. The justification is submitted to the judges, who are to look into the books, and see if such a justification can be maintained by the text of the statute law, or by the principles of the common law. If no such excuse can be found or produced, the silence of the books is an authority against the defendant. . . . According to this reasoning, it is now incumbent upon the defendants to show the law by which this seizure is warranted. If that cannot be done, it is trespass." These are the principles which protect every citizen of this government in the enjoyment of his personal liberty, his home, and his property, and no other "can abide the pure atmosphere of a government of political liberty and personal freedom."

This court in Chastang v. State, 83 Ala. 30, referring to the opinion of Justice Bradley, declared: "We indorse and approve everything said therein." The statute law provides for the issuance of search-warrants, but specifies on what grounds they are to be issued, and only on probable cause, supported by affidavit, naming the person, and particularly describing the property and place to be searched. Code, §§ 4727-4729. The search and seizure in the present case were not made under these statutory provisions. Section 4745 of the Code we have quoted above, and which provides that when a person is charged with a felony, and is supposed to have a dangerous weapon, or anything which may be used as evidence of the commission of the offense, he may be searched, and such weapon or thing may be seized and retained subject to the order of the court in which the defendant is to be tried. The question as to the dangerous weapon does not arise in this case. That part of the statute which authorizes the seizure and retention of "anything which may be used as evidence" on the prosecution is a mere statutory enactment of the common law. At common law the arresting officer had the right to remove money from the defendant's person; but this right was limited to cases in which the money was connected with the offense, or to be used as evidence. See Wharton, supra; Bishop, supra, and the cases cited in support of the text.

We are aware of the responsibility of sheriffs for the safety of prisoners, and their liability for escapes suffered by them or their deputies; but we can find no warrant, either in the common law or statute, for taking money from the person of the prisoner, unless it is connected with the offense charged, or to be used as evidence on his trial. If this right exist in the officer, as an absolute right to prevent escapes, he could, upon the arrest of a person charged with a trivial misdemeanor or disorderly conduct, strip him of all his personal effects. It is no answer to say the officer would not do it. The question is, Has he the right, by virtue of his authority to arrest, also to search and seize, except in cases authorized by the common law or by statute? "It is the duty of the courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon."

After a careful examination of the Constitution, prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures, the common law, the statutes, and authorities, we hold that it is the duty of an officer, having no other authority than the right to make the arrest, to search the party arrested, and seize and remove from him any dangerous weapon found on his person; and he may also seize any money, or anything connected with the offense, or which may be used as evidence against him on the prosecution, and retain the money or thing until turned over to the State's attorney, or paid into court to abide the result of the trial; that an officer acting in good faith, in the execution of his duty, and proceeding upon probable grounds for believing that the money or thing is connected with the offense charged, or may be used as evidence on the trial, may search and take from the defendant arrested by him on a criminal charge money found on his person, and he will not be liable in damages for a trespass, although it may turn out that the money or thing was not in fact connected with the offense, or could not be used as evidence of the commission of the offense, that the money or thing seized by the officer, under the foregoing limitations, during the time it is in his hands, or if paid into court, is not in the possession of the defendant, but it is thereby sequestered, and subject to attachment or garnishment, under section 2950 of the Code; that if the arrest was made not in good faith, or if the money or thing is seized without probable grounds for believing that it is connected with the offense, or useful as evidence on the trial, the levy made, under such circumstances, is invalid; or, if procured by trickery or fraud on the part of the attaching creditor, the levy will be held invalid; and the officer making the levy, if he knows of the fraud, and person procuring it to be done by such means and for such purposes, will be liable to a suit for damages. We believe these principles consistent with the personal liberty of the person arrested, as secured to him by the Constitution of the State, and concede to the officer all the authority given to him by the common or statute law. We know of no law which will prevent a creditor from having the property of his debtor levied upon to satisfy his debt, when it can be done without committing a trespass, or by fraud or violence. At common law, the property in the hands of an officer was regarded in gremio legis, and not subject to process; but by statute it is subject to legal process. The return of the court to the rule nisi shows that the prosecution and attachment suits against the movant are undecided, and are pending in court. Whether, under the principles declared in the foregoing opinion the money is subject to the attachment and garnishment, depends upon the evidence to be introduced on the trial and the garnishing creditor has a right to his day in court, and to have a jury pass upon the facts.

In any view we take of the case, the application for mandamus must be denied.

Mandamus denied.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Patrick O'BRIEN, Appl.,

v.

BALTIMORE BELT R. CO.

(....Md.....)

1. Authority to construct a railroad or any part thereof in a tunnel in a city street on the terms and conditions and in the mode fixed by ordinance, includes authority to construct portions of it in an open out where the ordinance so directs; and even without special authority the right to construct a tunnel would include the right to make properly graded approaches.
3. The mere depreciation in the value of the lot of an abutting owner who does not own the fee of the street, by the construction of a railroad therein and his deprivation of the full use of the street, but without any invasion of or physical interference with his lot or any obstruction of his access thereto, is not a taking of his property within the meaning of the constitutional provision as to compensation for property taken.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City dismissing his bill filed to enjoin defendant from laying its tracks in a street in front of his lots.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Robinson, Bryan, McSherry, Fowler and Briscoe, JJ. Messrs. Isidor Rayner, Thomas R. Clendinen and George R. Willis, for appellant:

NOTE.—Implied grants.

When the use of a thing is granted, everything essential to that use is granted also. Such right carries with it the implied authority to do all that is necessary to secure the enjoyment of such easement. Prescott v. White, 21 Pick. 841, 32 Am. Dec. 203; Prescott v. Williams, 5 Met. 429, 30 Am. Dec. 683; and cases cited; Pomfret v. Ricroft, 1 Saund. 823, note 6; Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177; 66 Am. Dec. 219.

When a right is granted, either by an individual or by a statute, the means of securing the right are also granted by implication. Carruth v. Grassie, 11 Gray, 211, 71 Am. Dec. 707.

Easement.

Thus when a man grants a close inaccessible except over his own land, he impliedly grants a right of passing over that land. Otherwise the grantee could derive no benefit from the grant. The same rule of construction would govern a reservation out of lands granted. Co. Litt. 56 a.; Liford's Case, 11 Coke, 52; Lord Darcy v. Askwith, Hob. 234; Clark v. Cogge, Cro. Jac. 170; Howton v. Frearson, 8 T. R. 56; Morris v. Edgington, 3 Taunt. 23; Gayetty v. Bethune, 14 Mass. 55.

Nothing will pass, as incident to the grant, except it be necessary to the enjoyment of the principal thing granted. Hence the grantee of a close surrounded by the grantor's land is entitled to a convenient way over the grantor's land. He may select a suitable route for his way, but in doing it he must regard the interest and convenience of the owner of the land. Nichols v. Luce, 41 Mass. 102.

Nothing passes which is not appurtenant to the land granted and directly necessary to its enjoyment. Leonard v. White, 7 Mass. 6; Coleman's App. 62 Pa. 252.

Thus the grant of trees standing on land of the grantor gives the right to enter and take them, and a sale of personal property gives a right to enter and remove it. A grant of the right to lay pipes carries the right to enter and repair them. Pomfret v. Ricroft, 1 Saund. 821.

By the same principle a way of necessity is created over the grantor's remaining land when there is no other access to the granted premises. Pierce 18 L. R. A.

v. Selleck, 18 Conn. 321; Lawton v. Rivers, 2 McCord, L. 445; Crossley v. Lightowler, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 438; Alley v. Carleton, 30 Tex. 78; Pingree v. McDuffie, 56 N. H. 303.

The necessity which will raise an implied easement varies with the nature of the property and of the easement. Covel v. Hart, 56 Me. 520.

It is a question of presumed intention. If the servitude is a burdensome one, only strict necessity will raise the implication. Great convenience alone will not give a way of necessity (Dodd v. Burchell, 1 Hurst. & C. 121; Brigham v. Smith, 4 Gray, 297; Smith v. Kinard, 2 Hill, L. 642); and the way will cease when the necessity ceases. Lida v. Hadley, 36 Ala. 627; Viall v. Carpenter, 14 Gray, 126.

So, if the purposes for which the land is granted are inconsistent with the exercise of the easement, it will not exist. Seeley v. Bishop, 19 Conn. 128.

What is called necessity is only a circumstance called in to explain the intention of the parties. Nichols v. Luce, 24 Pick. 102; Collins v. Prentice, 15 Conn. 39; American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 306; 2 Wait, Act. & Def. 638.

The grant of power being in derogation of common right is not to be extended by implication, and the act conferring the power must be strictly complied with. Statutes granting these powers are not to be construed so literally or so strictly as to defeat the evident purpose of the Legislature. They are to receive a reasonably strict and guarded construction, and the powers granted will extend no further than expressly stated, or than is necessary to accomplish the general scope and purpose of the grant. Re New York & H. R. R. Co. v. Kip, 46 N. Y. 546.

Whether a right of way is embraced in a deed, is always a question of construction, having reference to its terms not only, but to extrinsic facts also, and to the practical incidents connected with the grantor, and with the use of the land, at the time of the conveyance. The law gives such a construction to the conveyance, as an incident or appurtenance, that such incidents or appurtenances are included in it. In such cases the intention of the parties is to be learned from those facts. Huttemeler v. Albro, 18 N. Y. 51, 52; Orden v. Jennings, 66 Barb. 301.

The taking and use of the street by appellee will take away the value of appellant's property, substantially, and inflict serious and permanent injury.

Beckett v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 241, 3 C. P. 81.

This is forbidden by the Constitution. Md. Const. art. 3, § 40.

The right of the appellant as an abutting owner to the use of the street, and for access to and from his lot and house, is property within the meaning of the Constitution.

A steam railroad would be considered an additional servitude, easement or burden upon a street, because inconsistent with the ordinary and reasonable use of a street, while the use by a horse railroad is decided not inconsistent, because not permanent or exclusive.

The right of an abutting owner to use the street is property which is taken within the meaning of the Constitution, by the grant of such privileges as are claimed by defendant, and the injury and right to a remedy is the same whether the abutting owner owns the fee of the street or not, and cannot be taken without compensation.

Messrs. William A. Fisher, John K. Cowen, W. Irvine Cross and Hugh L. Bond, Jr., for appellee:

The rulings of the courts on this subject are not uniform, but the following may be stated as the result of the authorities:

1. The great weight of authority is that if the abutting owner does not own the fee of the street, then its occupancy by a railroad company, under legislative authority, is not the taking of any of his private property within the meaning of the constitutional provision, which requires condemnation proceedings to be instituted before such property can be taken.

2. Many authorities hold that a street can be used by a railroad company, although the fee of it may be in the abutting owner, and that such a use is not only not a taking of property within the meaning of the constitutional provision, but the abutting owner is not entitled to consequential damages for such occupancy of the street.

3. A very few authorities hold that a lot owner on a public street, whether he has the fee in the bed of the street or not, has such a peculiar interest therein that the construction of a steam railroad upon the street is a taking of his property within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

4. Other cases hold that the occupancy of a public street by a railroad company, under legislative sanction, is a legitimate and lawful use of the street, but it is not to be presumed that the railroad company is to be exempt from liability for special damage to the property of an abutting owner.

A rule of law opposed to and inconsistent with the "property doctrine," as stated in proposition 3, will be found stated in—

As to the general rule, compare Ohio Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 685, 25 L. ed. 836, with Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 688; Currier v. New York West Side Elev. P. R. Co. 6 Blatchf. 487.

The doctrine that the owner of a lot abutting on a street has an interest in the soil of the street, which amounts to property within the meaning of the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation, was first announced and adopted by the Supreme Court of Ohio in Crawford v. Delaware, 7 Ohio St. 459.

Minnesota has adopted the same rule in Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 1 L. R. A. 498, 39 Minn. 286, 12 Am. St. Rep. 644.

New York in Story v. Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 371, 104 N. Y. 268, and Abendroth v. New York Elev. R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 634, 122 N. Y. 1, applied this doctrine to elevated roads; while in Radcliff v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 196, the doctrine was held inapplicable to the case of a city changing the grade of the street. Moreover, and in Fobes v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 8 L. R. A. 453, 121 N. Y. 506, the court decided that a "steam railroad company, which, under license from the city authorities lays its tracks upon the surface of a street, is not liable for damages resulting from a reasonable use thereof to the easement of an abutting lot owner, who does not own the fee of the street."

In Maryland the court holds that an ordinary charter or enabling Act is not to be construed as conferring on a chartered company the State's immunity from liability for consequential damages.

Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Reaney, 42 Md. 117.

The distinction between the doctrine by which right of action is accorded for consequential damages and the rule of law under which the owner of property is protected by injunction from a taking of his property for public use, is illustrated by a comparison of the Reaney Case with Baltimore v. Appold, 42 Md. 442.

Even in Illinois, where the Constitution requires compensation to be made for property damaged as well as for that taken, the courts have been obliged to construe the provision as giving a right of action for damages merely, and not as entitling a landowner to an injunction to restrain the construction of the road, because consequential damages might thereby ensue to his property.

Stetson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 75 Ill. 74; Peoria & R. I. R. Co. v. Schertz, 84 Ill. 135; Denver & S. F. R. Co. v. Domke, 11 Colo. 247, 36 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 155. See also Hutton v. London & S. W. R. Co. 7 Hare, 259.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court below passed its order refusing the injunction upon consideration of the allegation, of the bill and the exhibits filed therewith, without reference to the answer of the defendant, which had been previously filed. The answer was properly before the court, and the defendant was entitled to have it considered, if material, in determining the question whether the injunction should issue. Lynn v. Mount Savage Iron Co. 34 Md. 624; Adams, Eq. 858, and notes. We entirely agree, however, with the learned judge below, that, without regard to the answer, the bill fails to present a case for an injunction.

The plaintiff is the owner of a lot of ground, with improvements thereon, situate on the east side of Howard Street, between Camden and Lee Streets, and conducts there the business of a livery stable. Howard Street, at this place, is 82½ feet wide, and the plaintiff is only an abutting proprietor on the street, with no estate in the bed thereof, but, as abutting owner of property on the east side of the street, he claims to be entitled to the full, free and unobstructed use of the entire width of the street as one of the public highways of the city. The defendant Company was incorporated under the General Railroad Incorporation Law of the State for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad through parts of Baltimore City and parts of Baltimore County, and, finding it necessary to tunnel a part of the way through the city, the Company applied to the General Assembly of 1890 for authority to construct such tunnel, and that authority was given by the Acts of 1890, chap. 139. By the first section of that Act it is provided that the Company "shall be authorized to construct its railroad, or any part thereof, in such tunnel, under such ordinance or ordinances as may be passed by the mayor and city council of Baltimore relating to the route of said railroad through the City of Baltimore, and the mode, terms and conditions of the building and construction of said railroad within said city." Immediately after the passage of this Act the mayor and city council of Baltimore, by special ordinance, designated the route of the road, and made elaborate provisions in regard to the mode, terms and conditions of the construction of the road through the city. By the first section of the ordinance is defined the route of the road; and, as it affects Howard Street, it is provided that it shall run from a certain point "in a northerly direction to the western side of Howard Street, between Montgomery and Lee Streets; thence along, in, and occupying the western route half of Howard Street, parallel with the eastern line of said street, and distant therefrom forty feet, measured from said eastern building line to the eastern limit of said railroad, to the south line of Camden Street,—said railroad, from where it intersects the west line of Howard Street to its intersection with the south line of Camden Street, to be depressed within a wall cut; thence along and under Howard Street by a tunnel to the northerly side of Richmond Street; thence, etc. And in a proviso to the same section of the ordinance it is required "that all open cuts in any street, lane or alley in the city authorized to be built under the provisions of this ordinance shall be protected on both sides by a granite coping at least two feet high, with neat iron rail on top." The plaintiff charges in his bill that the defendant Company intends to proceed forthwith in the construction of its roadway, and to dig up the west half of the bed of Howard Street in front of his property on the east side of that street to a depth of from ten to twenty-four feet below the present surface of the street; that said plan is known as an "open cut;" and that, when said open cut is made, Howard Street, between Lee and Camden Streets, will be forever destroyed as a public highway, to the extent of said open cut, and will be devoted, to that extent, to the exclusive use of the Railroad Company. The plaintiff denies the authority of the mayor and city council to grant to the railroad company any such exclusive right to the use of the streets of the city, and insists that such use will create a new and additional servitude on the bed of the street, which the mayor and council have no right to impose; but, even if such new and additional servitude be rightfully imposed, it is insisted that the use of the bed of the street can only be availed of by the Railroad Company upon paying to the abutting lotowners just compensation for such use. The plaintiff further charges that no condemnation proceedings have been taken, and none are contemplated; nor is it contemplated by the Railroad Company that any compensation whatever shall be made to the plaintiff or other abutting lotowners who will be affected by this open cut in the bed of the street. He therefore charges that if the defendant Company is allowed to proceed in the manner it proposes, without first making just compensation, it will be in violation of section 40 of the third article of the Constitution of this State, and also in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States; and he therefore prays that the defendant may be enjoined in the use of the street until just compensation is made for what he alleges will be a serious injury to his property. It is not charged or in any way claimed that the plaintiff will be deprived of or seriously hindered in the right of access to his property from the street by the making of the cut; nor is it alleged or shown that the foundations of the plaintiff's buildings, abutting on the street, will be in any manner undermined or impaired by the cut proposed to be made in the street. The street, after the cut is made, will still remain, in front of the plaintiff's property on the east side of the cut, about forty-one feet wide. There is no question, therefore, presented here as to the right of the plaintiff to compensation for obstructing access to his property from the street; nor is there any pretense that there will be any physical invasion of his private property abutting on the street. The foundation of the right to relief asserted by the plaintiff is the fact that he is an abutting owner of property on the street, and the making of the open cut will deprive him of the use of that part of the street as at present enjoyed by him.

1. The first contention urged on behalf of the plaintiff is that the Acts of the General Assembly of 1890, chap. 139, in conferring special authority upon the defendant Company to construct its railroad in a tunnel within the limits of the city did not confer authority to construct any part of such road by way of open cuts in the streets; and that the mayor and city council exceeded their authority in attempting to confer power upon the Company, by ordinance, to construct any part of its road in the streets of the city by way of open cuts. But, if we recur to the terms of the grant of power by the Legislature to the mayor and city council, it will at once appear that the power granted was ample to justify the ordinance that was passed. The mayor and city council were authorized to designate by ordinance the route of the road, and also to prescribe the mode, terms and conditions of its construction. The right to prescribe the mode and conditions of its construction certainly embraced the power to authorize, by ordinance, the making of any part of the road by open cuts, if found to be proper and necessary in the construction of the road on the route designated. But, apart from the special terms of the Statute, the Company was authorized to construct such part of its road in a tunnel as should be found necessary; and the grant of that power carried with it, by reasonable implication, all that is necessary and proper for the exercise of the power. Properly graded approaches are indispensable to the use of a tunnel as part of a railroad, and therefore the power to make such approaches must exist. In Ohio Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 640, 25 L. ed. 388, the Supreme Court of the United States said that the grant of power by the Legislature to build a bridge or construct a tunnel carried with it, of course, all that was necessary for the exercise of the power. And in the case of Dodge v. Essex County Comrs., 8 Met. 380, Chief Justice Shaw laid down the principle as being unquestionable that "an authority to construct any public work carries with it an authority to use the appropriate means. An authority to make a railroad is an authority to reduce the line of the road to a level, and for that purpose to make cuts, as well through ledges of rock as through banks of earth." It is plain, therefore, that there is no foundation for this first contention of the plaintiff.

2. The next question, and that which is the principal question of the case, is whether the plaintiff, being only an abutting owner on the east side of Howard Street, with no freehold or leasehold estate in the bed of the street, has such an interest therein, by reason of his abutting proprietorship, as to entitle him to be compensated therefor by the Railroad Company before using the street; such compensation to be ascertained and rendered in the manner and according to the provision of the fortieth section of the third article of the Constitution of this State; or, to state the question in a more concise form, whether the use of the street by the Railroad Company in the manner proposed, and under the conditions stated, would be such taking of the private property of the plaintiff as is forbidden by the Constitution of this State, except upon payment of just compensation first being made. The Constitution of this State (§ 40, art. 3) declares that the Legislature shall enact no law authorizing private property to be taken for public use without just compensation, to be agreed upon by the parties or awarded by a jury, being first paid or tendered to the party entitled to such compensation. As will be observed, this constitutional provision does not profess to declare what rights shall be regarded as property; but the thing of which the party is deprived must be private property, and it must be taken for a public use. Nor does the Constitution declare what shall constitute a taking, within the meaning of the inhibition. These are questions of definition left to be fixed by a just construction of the terms employed. There would seem to be no question of the right and power of the Legislature of the State, through the agency of the municipal government, to change and alter the grades of existing streets from time to time, and as often as may be deemed proper, without liability being incurred by the agents doing the work, to the abutting owners of property, for the mere consequential damages that may be suffered by reason of the changed condition of the streets. In many cases the damage suffered from such changes in the grades of streets is very serious, and may even considerably affect the value of property; but yet, if the work be done with due care to avoid unnecessary injury to the abutting property, and there be no physical invasion thereof, the damage suffered is without remedy. In such cases, the work having been done by legal authority, and for municipal purposes, it is said the private damage or annoyance occasioned thereby must be suffered, in order to advance the public good. Reaney's Case, 42 Md. 117; Willison's Case, 50 Md. 138; Ohio Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 836; Vanderlip v. Grand Rapids, 73 Mich. 522; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. §§ 989, 990; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 666-668. But this reasoning, applicable to the case of the change of grades and the improvements of streets for municipal purposes, does not apply in the case of the grant of power to change the grade of and occupy the street with steam-railroad tracks by a railroad company having no connection with the municipal government. In such case a different principle applies, and the rights of individual property owners are in no respect subordinated to the rights of the railroad company. While the right in the State to grant the power to a railroad company, to occupy the street is unquestionable, by virtue of its power to control all the public highways of the State, the adjoining lot-owners are not without redress for any substantial injury sustained to their property rights that may be produced by reason of the construction or operation of the railroad in the street. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 817, 331, 27 L. ed. 789, 744, when speaking of legislative authority to a railroad company to bring its tracks within the municipal limits of Washington City: "Grants of privileges or powers to corporate bodies, like those in question, confer no license to use them in disregard of the private right of others, and with immunity for their invasion. The great principle of the common law, which is equally the teaching of Christian morality, so to use one's property as not to injure others, forbids any other application or use of the rights and powers conferred."

But, notwithstanding the Railroad Company may be liable on common-law principles, the question still remains to be answered, Will the cutting and use of the street, as proposed by the Railroad Company, be the taking of private property, in respect of the rights of the plaintiff as abutting lot-owner, within the meaning of the Constitution? As already stated, it is not charged that there will be any invasion of or physical interference with any part of the plaintiff's lot in the construction of the road. The most that he claims for is that he will be deprived of the full use of the street as it now exists, and that his property will be depreciated in value by the construction of the road. This, however, is but an injury, to whatever extent it may be suffered, of an incidental or consequential nature. The construction of the railroad being authorized by competent authority, it cannot be treated as a public nuisance; and no right of action can arise against the Company before it is known whether, and to what extent, damage may be sustained by the construction of the road in the bed of the street. In such case as this, therefore, it would seem to be clear, both upon principle and authority, that there is no such taking of private property for public use as is contemplated by the Constitution of the State; and hence there is no ground for any preliminary proceeding by way of condemnation. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 38 Mich. 62; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. chap. 15, pp. 666-681, and the cases there collated; Elliot, Roads and Streets, 155-162.

The counsel for the plaintiff have strongly pressed upon the court the propriety of adopting and following the principles applied in the Elevated Railroad Cases, decided by the Court of Appeals of New York. But without saying whether those decisions should be accepted or not in like cases occurring here, this case does not call for the application or rejection of the doctrine applied in those cases. The doctrine of the Elevated Railroad Cases of New York, as summarized by the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of New York Elev. R. Co. v. Fifth Nat. Bank, 185 U. S. 440, 34 L. ed. 234, is this: "An elevated railroad erected in and over a street pursuant to the statutes of the State, and with due compensation to the owners of property taken for the purpose, is a lawful structure. The owners of land abutting on a street have an easement of way and of light and air over it, and, through a bill in equity for an injunction, may recover of the elevated railroad company full compensation for the permanent injury to this easement, but in an action at law cannot, without the defendant's acquiescence, recover permanent damages, measured by the diminution in value of their property, but can recover such temporary damages only as they have sustained to the time of commencing the action." It thus appears that the exercise of equity jurisdiction in those cases was founded largely upon the inadequate remedy at law, as administered in the courts of New York. But here there is no such ground for equitable interposition; the laws of this State furnishing adequate remedy by action at law for any injury that may be suffered by the plaintiff.

There can be no question as to the power of the Legislature of the State, in providing for the construction of the railroad of the defendant through the city, to require compensation to be made to persons whose property may be injuriously affected by changes made in the grades of the streets, or by any other appropriation of them, though the property affected may not be taken, within the meaning of the Constitution. Hence the Acts of 1890, chap. 189, authorized the mayor and city council of Baltimore, by ordinance, to designate the route, and to prescribe the mode, terms and conditions of the construction of the road within the city. And by the special ordinance, passed in pursuance of the Statute, among the terms and conditions prescribed, in the second section thereof it is provided that the said Company shall also pay and be liable for the actual damage sustained by any and all property abutting on that part of any square, street, lane or alley of which the grade shall be so changed, by reason of any such change of grade in any of the squares, streets, lanes or alleys of the city occasioned by the construction of said railroad; said damages to be recovered in the same manner as provided by section 169, art. 23, of the Code Pub. Gen. Laws." And again, by section 12 of the Ordinance, section 169 of article 23 of the Code is thereby expressly declared to be applicable to the building of said railroad, for the injuries done to private property by the location and construction of said railroad, etc. Section 169 of article 23 of the Code Pub. Gen. Laws, referred to (codified from the Act of 1876), declares that "every railroad company laying down any such track or tracks upon any such public street, road, alley or other public ground shall be responsible for injuries done to private property by such location, lying upon or near to such public ground, which may be recovered by civil action brought by the owner or owners, at any time within two years from the completion of such track or tracks, before the proper court." By the acceptance of the Acts of 1890, chap. 189, and the ordinance passed thereunder, the Railroad Company became bound by the terms and provisions thereof; and the legal remedy thus provided would seem to be ample to protect the plaintiff in his rights, though his case be not within the provision of the Constitution, and that is made so, even if he were without remedy by the common law.

For the reasons assigned this court is of opinion that the order of the court below should be affirmed, and that the bill be dismissed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

ELECTRIC IMPROVEMENT CO.

v.

CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(45 Fed. Rep. 598.)

1. An ordinance prohibiting the suspension of electric wires over or upon the roofs of buildings is within the legitimate police powers of a city, where such suspension of these wires is extremely dangerous, both as being liable to originate fires and as obstructing the extinguishment of fires otherwise originated.

2. Public officers may be authorized by ordinance to remove dangerous electric wires suspended over or above buildings where the owners fail to do so after notice to remove them.

NOTE.—The term "police power" defined.

It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of the police power than to mark its boundaries, or prescribe limits to its exercise. Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84.

This power is, and must be from its very nature, incapable of any very exact definition or limitation. Upon it depends the security of social order, the life and health of the citizen, the comfort of an existence in a thickly populated community, the enjoyment of private and social life, and the beneficial use of property. Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 83, 21 L. ed. 306.

It extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State; . . .

(March 30, 1891.)

SUIT to enjoin defendants from enforcing an ordinance providing for the removal of electric wires suspended over or upon the roofs of buildings in San Francisco. Injunction denied.

The ordinance was as follows:

"Order No. 2163. Prohibiting the suspension of electric wires over or upon the roofs of buildings, etc. The people of the City and County of San Francisco do ordain as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, company, or corporation to run or suspend or stretch over or across, or upon the top or roof, or any portion of the top or roof, of any building in the City and County of San Francisco, any wire used for the purpose of conducting electricity, or an electric current, or for any purpose whatsoever.

"Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person, company or corporation to keep or maintain over, or across, or upon the top or roof, or any portion of the top or roof, of any building in the City and County of San Francisco, any wire used for the purpose of conducting electricity or an electric current, or for any purpose whatsoever, for more than ten days after such person, company or corporation shall have received notice in writing, signed by the chief engineer of the fire department of said City and County, to remove the same; and each and every day subsequent to the ten days after such prescribed notice shall have been given, any maintenance or keeping of any wires hereinabove prohibited shall constitute a new and separate violation of this ordinance.

"Sec. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person, company or corporation to attach to, or suspend from, or support upon any building in the City and County of San Francisco any wire used for the purpose of conducting electricity, unless the same be attached, suspended, or supported for the purpose of supplying to the owner or the occupant of such building, or to the owner or occupant of some part thereof, electric light or electric power, or telephone or telegraph service.

"Sec. 4. It shall be unlawful for any person, company, or corporation to run or suspend or stretch or keep or maintain upon any pole or other support erected in or upon the streets or in or upon any street in the City and County of San Francisco any electric-light wire or any wire used to conduct electricity or an electric current for the purpose of producing electric light or motive power unless such person, company, or corporation shall have heretofore obtained, or shall hereafter obtain, permission of the board of supervisors of said City and County so to do.

"Sec. 5. The provisions of this ordinance shall not apply to any building occupied in his or its business, by any person, company, and persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health and prosperity of the State. Of the perfect right of the Legislature to do this no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned." Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 149.

No exposition has been given of this power more thorough and satisfactory, or more often quoted with approval, than that announced in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 85, in which it is defined to be "the power vested in the Legislature by the Constitution, to make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth, and of the subjects of the same."

It is the power by which the health, good order, peace and general welfare of the community are promoted. Webber v. Virginia, 106 U. S. 843, 26 L. ed. 568.

The States have full power to regulate within their limits matters of internal police, including in that general designation whatever will promote the peace, comfort, convenience and prosperity of their people. Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 683, 27 L. ed. 445.

The police power of a State extends to all matters which concern its internal regulation. It embraces those which affect the lives, limbs, health, comfort and welfare of all in their persons and their property. It subjects both persons and property to those restraints and burdens which are necessary in order that the general comfort and welfare may be secured. It prescribes the modes in which it is reasonable that each shall use and enjoy his own property, in order that others may be guarded in the reasonable use and enjoyment of theirs, and thus prevents a conflict of rights, by determining what uses and enjoyments by each are consistent with 13 L. R. A.

those to which others are entitled. Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 16; Com. v. Barse, 132 Mass. 542.

What is a legitimate exercise of this power.

No doubt it is entirely competent for the city authorities, unless they are bound by some absolute contract permitting the poles and wires to stand as they are, to have them removed and put an end to such unsightly obstructions. There must be a power somewhere, to cause their removal, and to regulate and control the manner in which telegraph lines shall enter or pass through a city. Mutual Union Tele. Co. v. Chicago, 16 Fed. Rep. 309.

Notwithstanding telegraph lines may be an instrument of commerce, a municipal corporation has the right to determine how, in what manner, and upon what condition a telegraph company shall enter and pass through it for the purpose of allowing the citizens of the country to communicate by telegraph one with another. Mutual Union Tele. Co. v. Chicago, 16 Fed. Rep. 309; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 698, note.

As illustrative of the general powers conferred upon municipal corporations, the courts decide that they may prohibit the throwing of heavy or dangerous articles from the upper stories of buildings into the streets or open spaces near them, where persons are in the habit of passing; and may, when not inconsistent with general or special legislation applicable to the municipality, establish fire limits, and prevent the erection therein of wooden buildings. Charleston City Council v. Elford, 1 McMull. L. 234; Brady v. North Western Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425; Douglas v. Com. 2 Rawle, 262; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 408; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349, 352, per Woodruff, J., arguendo; Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 681; King v. Davenport, 96 Ill. 305; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575; Klingler v. Bickel, 10 Cent. or corporation engaged in selling or furnishing or supplying electric lights or electric power, or engaged in conducting or carrying on a telephone or telegraph business; nor shall they apply to any wire erected and used exclusively for fire alarm and city and county purposes.

"Sec. 6. Any person violating any provision of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment.

"Sec. 7. If any person, who has heretofore run or suspended or stretched, or who shall hereafter run or suspend or stretch, over, or across, or upon the top or roof, or any portion of the top or roof, of any building in the City and County of San Francisco, or who shall hereafter keep or maintain any such wire over or across or upon the top or roof, or any portion of the top or roof, of any building, in said City and County, shall fail to remove the same within ten days after the receipt of a written notice to do so, signed by the chief engineer of the fire department of said City and County, then it shall be lawful for the said chief engineer of the fire department, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to cause such wire to be removed."

Messrs. Haggin & Van Ness and George C. Gorham, Jr., for complainant.

Messrs. Estee, Wilson & McCutcheon, with Messrs. Langhorne & Miller, for defendant:

In order to hold a law to be unreasonable, the unreasonableness must appear upon its face, and must exclude the possibility of reasonableness.

But the question of reasonableness or unreasonableness is not before and cannot be considered by this court.

Thorne*, 7 Paige, 263, 4 L. ed. 148; Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405,—do not support its contention.

The discretion which the ordinance vests in the chief engineer of the fire department is neither arbitrary nor unreasonable, nor does it vest him with the power to oppress one or to favor another.

If this court should hold that any person could run electric wires over the tops of houses, it would place the control of such wires beyond the reach of the municipality, and place in the hands of irresponsible persons the power to work almost untold injury.

The granting of such privileges as that which complainant claims the right to exercise is within the control of the municipality.

No man may so use his own property as to endanger the life or property of another, and it would not only have been within the power, but it would have been the duty, of the chief engineer of the fire department, in the absence of any ordinance authorizing him so to do, to remove from the tops of houses the wires of complainant, and all other wires of a similar nature.

Sawyer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Without discussing the question at large, I shall content myself with a brief announcement of my conclusions in this case. After a careful consideration of the questions involved, I am satisfied that "Ordinance No. 2163, prohibiting the suspension of electric wires over or upon the roofs of buildings," etc., is a valid ordinance passed within the legitimate police powers of the city under the authority of the State. In Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 138, 21 L. ed. 932, Mr. Justice Field says that the dissenting judges in the Slaughter-House Cases "recognized the power of the State in its fullest extent (the police power), observing that it embraced all regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace and safety of society, and that all sorts of restrictions and burdens were imposed under it; and that when these were not in conflict with any constitutional prohibition, or fundamental principles, they could not be successfully assailed in a judicial tribunal." So, in Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co., 111 U. S. 747, 28 L. ed. 585, the court, quoting from Chancellor Kent, says: "Unwholesome trades, slaughter-houses, operations offensive to the senses, the deposit of powder, the application of steam power to propel cars, the building of combustible materials, and the burial of the dead, may all be interdicted by the law in the midst of dense population, on the general and rational principle that every person ought to so use his property as not to injure his neighbors; and that private interests must be made subservient to the general interests of the community."

In Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 118 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, the court distinctly holds, upon a much milder case of danger than this, that the Fourteenth Amendment in no respect interferes with or limits the exercise of this police power. The exercise of no other branch of this power is more important than that which protects, or seeks to protect, the public safety of a great city, like San Francisco. That the stretching of these wires over buildings in the manner practiced, as shown by the evidence, no one, I think, can doubt after reading the affidavits, is extremely dangerous, both as being liable to originate fires, and as obstructions to the extinguishment of fires otherwise originated. Indeed, the danger is a matter of common knowledge. We might almost as well require strict proof of the danger of storing gunpowder, or dynamite, in, under, upon or about our houses. Even if these wires can be so put up and insulated as to be safe, in the mode suggested by one of the complainant's witnesses, Prof. Keith, it has not been done. The professor himself does not claim that they are, now, safe. The danger is of a character cognate to that of gunpowder. There is doubtless a difference in the degree of the danger, but the consequences are liable to be far more widespread and calamitous. Should a raging fire occur, originated by the electric current or otherwise, these dangerous wires might so obstruct the efforts of the firemen, to extinguish it, as to result in the destruction of the entire city. It is certainly competent, under the police powers of the State, to suppress such dangerous erections, in the interests of the common safety of the community. Who can say, in view of the constant and perpetual menace, that the provisions of this ordinance are unreasonable? Is it unreasonable because the remedy against the great public and private nuisance is prompt, and efficient, when no other remedy is certain to be equally so? We know not how soon a calamity from this source may come upon us. It may be while we are litigating the question. If one should store a large quantity of gunpowder or dynamite among the buildings in the midst of the city, would a like remedy be deemed unreasonable, or inadmissible, or void, as not being due process of law? The fact is, the gunpowder has no right to be there. It is a standing and dangerous menace to the neighborhood, which anyone affected by the nuisance has a right to abate. And when it is so extended as to become a public menace and nuisance, the public officers, especially, when specifically authorized to do so, can lawfully abate it. And such a constant and continuous menace and nuisance in a less degree, perhaps, it is manifest, these wires erected as they appear to be, are. They have no more right to be there than gunpowder. The only wonder is that owners of buildings in view of the recognized danger will permit their use for such purposes. True, the supervisors cannot make an article dangerous by simply declaring it to be so, when in fact it is not. But the practice, as it now prevails, against which this ordinance is directed, is shown to be dangerous, and, we, ourselves, all know it to be so. There can be no successful disputing of the fact. The order is general and applicable to all. If it is not enforced as to all, it ought to be, and the chief of police declares his purpose to enforce it in all cases that come to his notice. I see no good reason to believe that it was passed for the purpose of discrimination in favor of another company, as claimed, or that it is intended to be so enforced. I do not think it violates any provision of the national Constitution. I regret to be obliged, by this decision, to affect, so seriously, the interests of the enterprising parties who are endeavoring to supply our citizens with electricity for the various purposes to which it is now applied. But I cannot decline to administer the law as I find it, for the safety and security of the lives and property of the citizens of San Francisco.

In accordance with the conclusions which I have reached, an injunction must be denied, and it is so ordered.

James H. CHACE.

(....R. I....)

Words which merely impute a criminal intention to another, such as, that "He is going to start a house of ill-fame, so sign a protest against him," are not actionable.

(June 13, 1891.)

ACTION brought to recover damages for an alleged slander. On demurrer to the declaration. Demurrer sustained.

NOTE.—What constitutes criminal intent.

To constitute crime there must be a joint operation of act and criminal intent, or criminal negligence. *Desty, Am. Crim. Law, § 5, citing Allen v. State, 52 Ala. 388; Miles v. State, 58 Ala. 380; Yoes v. State, 9 Ark. 42; Ross v. Com. 2 B. Mon. 419; People v. Harris, 29 Cal. 679; People v. White, 34 Cal. 183; State v. Will, 1 Dev. & B. L. 121; Long v. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. James M. Ripley and George A. Littlefield, for defendant, in support of the demurrer:

It is not sufficient to prove words which amount to a mere intention to commit a crime not evidenced by any overt act.

Ogders, Slander & Libel, p. 120; 1 Starkie, Slander, pp. 20, 54.

"You will steal," or "I believe you will steal," were held not actionable, as being only an expression of the speaker's opinion and charging no crime committed.

Bays v. Hunt, 60 Iowa, 251.

It has been universally held not actionable to charge a nun with a mere intention to commit a crime.

Crafts v. Brown, 8 Bulst. 167; Murray v. —, 2 Bulst. 206; Seaton v. Cordray, Wright (Ohio) 101; Cornelius v. Van Slyck, 21 Wend. 70; McKee v. Ingalls, 5 Ill. 30; Kirksey v. Fike, 29 Ala. 207; Harrison v. Stratton, 4 Esp. 218; 1 Vin. Abr. 440, p. 9.

Words in order to be held slanderous per se as touching and concerning one in his office, business or occupation, must impeach either his skill or knowledge or his official or professional conduct in his own particular business.

Ogders, Slander & Libel, p. 65.

In order to hold words of this class actionable, they must have a direct tendency to injure the plaintiff in his particular business.

Angle v. Alexander, 7 Bing. 119; Lumby v. Allday, 1 Cromp. & J. 301; Brayne v. Cooper, 5 Mees. & W. 249; Sibley v. Tomlins, 4 Tyr. 90; Ruel v. Tatnell, 29 Week. Rep. 172.

If the imputation complained of is not a charge of crime or of business incapacity, then it is nothing worth considering. It does not appear that plaintiff's damage is the direct result of the defendant's words. The damage must be the natural, immediate and legitimate consequence of the words which the defendant uttered, and a consequence which the defendant knew, or ought to have known, would follow from his words.

An act unlawful in itself may sometimes be punishable because of a criminal intent connected with it. Fairlee v. People, 11 Ill. 1. See Rex v. Horner, Cald. 285.

Every crime contains two elements: the criminal act and the criminal intent; the former consisting of those external actions or omissions which the law prohibits; the latter of that evil and malicious will which finds expression in the criminal act. See Bl. Com. 20; Broom, Com. Law, 847; 1 Bishop, Cr. L. 6th ed. § 208; 1 Hale, P. C. 15.

Although the essence of every offense is the wrongful intent with which it is done, and without which it cannot exist (Stein v. State, 37 Ala. 123; Roseberry v. State, 50 Ala. 160; *People v. It is the intent which determines the criminality of the act. See Roseberry v. State, 50 Ala. 160; Reg. v. Prince, L. R. 2 Cr. Cas. 154, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 15; Broom, Crim. Law, 871.

And when acts are criminal only when performed with some specific design, this specific design enters into the nature of the act itself, and is called the specific intent (see 1 *Bishop, Cr. Charge of mere purpose to commit a crime is not actionable.

If the words only imply the purpose or intention on the part of the person spoken of to commit a crime, or describe him as possessing a disposition, or as wanting moral qualities which would prompt him to commit the crime, or amount to an allegation that, if opportunity offers, he would commit it, they are not actionable per se. Bays v. Hunt, 60 Iowa, 251.

To charge a person with intent to commit a crime is not actionable. McKee v. Ingalls, 5 Ill. 30; Wilson v. Tatum, 8 Jones, L. 300; Seaton v. Cordray, Wright (Ohio) 101; Newell, Defamation, Slander & Libel, 112.

The mere intention to commit a crime, without an attempt by some overt act, is no offense. Weed v. Bibbins, 32 Barb. 315.

It has been said the cases are uniform on the point that for an imputation of evil inclinations or principle no action lies, unless it affects the plaintiff in some particular character, or produces a special damage. 1 Starkie, Slander & Libel, 24; Harrison v. Stratton, 4 Esp. 218; Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 162.

Not every unfounded imputation of crime is actionable; and it is for the jury to determine whether the words were spoken in good faith in prosecuting an inquiry as to a suspected offense, and, if so, whether they were uttered in stronger language, or in a more public manner than was necessary. Padmore v. Lawrence, 11 Ad. & El. 890; Tempest v. Chambers, 1 Stark. 67; Heming v. Power, 10 Mees. & W. 564; Harper v. Harper, 10 Bush, 447; 5 Wait, Act. & Def. 732.

No action can be based upon a mere suspicion or opinion, which does not import any express or precise imputation of guilt (Hodgson v. Scarlett, 1 Barn. & Ald. 243; Harrison v. King, 4 Price, 46), nor accuses an individual of crime, no other person being present (Force v. Warren, 15 C. B. N. S. 806; Sheffill v. Van Deusen, 13 Gray, 304; Desmond v. Brown, 33 Iowa, 13; Halle v. Fuller, 5 Thomp. & C. 716, 2 Hun, 519), or none who understood the language in which the words were uttered. Lyle v. Clason, 1 Cal. 581; Broderick v. James, 3 Daly, 451; Wait, Act. & Def. 732.

Odgers, Slander & Libel, p. 308.

The special damage complained of, in order to ground an action of slander, must be the direct result of the defendant's words, not even the result of those words combined with other causes.

Mr. George J. West for plaintiff.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case for slander. The declaration, to which the defendant demurs, sets out that the plaintiff is a licensed retail liquor dealer in the City of Providence, and has been such for a long time. That, anticipating a renewal of his license for the year 1890-91, he made large purchases of liquors in advance, and also refitted and refurbished his saloon at large expense. That the defendant, well knowing the premises, but intending to injure him, the plaintiff, and prevent him from again procuring a license for the carrying on of his said business, in the presence and hearing of divers good citizens, uttered, declared and published the following false, scandalous and malicious words of and concerning the plaintiff, viz.: "He [meaning the plaintiff] is going to start a house of ill fame [meaning a house to be kept for the purposes of prostitution], so sign a protest against him [meaning the plaintiff];"—meaning and intending thereby that said plaintiff was going to start a house to be kept and maintained for the purposes of prostitution; and that said plaintiff ought not to be granted a license to carry on the business of retail liquor dealer as he desired, in accordance with his application on file in the office of the license commissioners in said city, and to therefore sign a written remonstrance protesting that said plaintiff ought to be refused a license, which said defendant then and there presented to said people. The declaration further sets out that, in consequence of the uttering and publishing of said words by the defendant, the majority of persons owning the greater part of the land within 200 feet of the said saloon, or who were occupants of it, signed a remonstrance protesting that license should not be granted to the plaintiff to carry on said business, whereupon said license commissioners refused to grant such license, and were rendered unable to grant the same; and alleging special damage.

The principal ground urged in support of the demurrer is that the words complained of, since they do not amount to an imputation of the commission of an offense, but only to a charge of an intention to commit one, are not actionable either per se, or from having caused special damage. The main question raised by the demurrer therefore is this, viz.: Are words actionable which merely impute a criminal intention to another? We think this question must be answered in the negative. Words which falsely charge a person with the commission of a criminal offense are actionable upon the familiar ground that they may endanger him by subjecting him to the penalties of the law, and render him infamous in the community. But the charge, in order to be obnoxious to the law, must be of an offense actually committed or attempted,—a punishable offense,—and not of an offense existing in contemplation or intention merely; for the law does not take cognizance of one's intentions merely, however malicious or wicked they may be, but only takes cognizance thereof when coupled with and giving significance to his acts. So that, in order to render one's intent of any importance in the eye of the law, it must be combined with his act. It therefore follows that, as mere intent to commit a crime is not a violation of the law, and hence not punishable, to accuse one of having such an intent is not to accuse him of any crime or offense. The language which the plaintiff complains of as being slanderous is this: "He is going to start a house of ill fame." This language, if indeed it is anything more than the expression of an opinion on the part of the defendant, does not amount to a charge of any crime or offense, or even of an attempt to commit one. That such a charge is not actionable is one of the few things in the Law of Slander which is evidently settled beyond controversy. The law upon this point is well stated in the American Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 13, p. 853) as follows: "Words which merely impute a criminal intention, not yet put into action, are not actionable. Guilty thoughts are not a crime. But as soon as any step is taken to carry out such intention, as soon as any overt act is done, an attempt to commit a crime has been made; and every attempt to commit an indictable offense is, at common law, a misdemeanor, and in itself indictable. To impute such an attempt is therefore clearly actionable."

In Cornelius v. Van Slyck, 21 Wend. 70, 71, the court, in speaking of the sense in which the words should be taken, says: "Where they plainly import a charge of mere intention to do a criminal act, or only amount to an assertion that the plaintiff will do it at a future time, they are not actionable." In Seaton v. Cordruy, Wright (Ohio) 101, the court says: "An action may be sustained for charging another with being a thief, or with having stolen, but not for imputing a mere intention to steal, or with having an evil disposition. The foundation of the slander is that the charge, if true, would subject the accused to infamous punishment; an evil disposition, without act, cannot so subject anyone." See also Townshend, Slander & Libel, 3d ed. 161; McKee v. Ingalls, 5 Ill. 30; Harrison v. Stratton, 4 Esp. 218; Wilson v. Tatum, 8 Jones, L. 300; Stoner v. Audley, Cro. Eliz. 250; Dr. Poe's Case, cited in Murray v. —, 2 Bulst. 206; 1 Vin. Abr. 440; Odgers, Slander & Libel, 57; Sillars v. Collier, 151 Mass. 50, 58, 54, 6 L. R. A. 680.

But the plaintiff contends, in support of his declaration, that any defamatory or disparaging words spoken of another, which cause special damage, are actionable. While we cannot subscribe to quite so broad a statement of the law as this, yet we think that the proposition is substantially correct; that is to say, that false, defamatory words spoken of another are either actionable per se, or by reason of having caused special damage. We do not think, however, that the words relied on in the declaration are defamatory, within the legal meaning of that term. To defame another by language is to harm or destroy his good fame or reputation, or to disgrace or calumniate him. In order to have this evil effect, however, it is evident that the language used concerning him must relate to his conduct or character as they now are or have been in the past, and not be the mere opinion of the speaker as to what they will be at some indefinite period in the future. In other words, that language which amounts to a mere assertion of opinion as to what will be the future conduct or character of another is not actionable; but that it is only actionable when it relates to what the person now is, or has been in the past, or to what he is doing or attempting to do, or has done or attempted to do in the past; that is, when it relates to something actual, instead of something which is merely imaginary or conjectural. The character of a man is what he now is, and not what he may be at some future time. Among the multitude of different forms of expression found in the books which have been held to be actionable we have been unable to find any case, nor have we been referred to any, in which language analogous to that relied on in the plaintiff's declaration has been held sufficient to maintain an action for slander.

Demurrer sustained.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Minnie SPECT, Resp't.,

v.

Lou G. SPECT, App't.

(....Cal.....)

A mortgagee in possession does not lose his rights as such by the fact that his right of action for his debt has become barred by the Statute of Limitations, and he can still resist any action to deprive him of his security.

(March 25, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Colusa County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. F. Howard and S. G. Tomkins, for appellant:

It should be imposed as a condition to plaintiff's obtaining relief that she first satisfy defendant's lien.

Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271.

Messrs. H. M. Albery and W. G. Dyas, for respondent:

The mortgage does not provide for the possession of the land in controversy, by the mortgagee. A mortgage, to entitle a mortgagee to possession, must so provide.

Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 526; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 309; Civ. Code, § 2927.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in her answer to a complaint in ejectment, which was in the ordinary form, denied all its allegations, and, "for a separate and equitable defense to plaintiff's action, and for the purpose of obtaining equitable relief herein," alleged that in October, 1875, Jonas Spect, who was then the owner and in possession of the demanded premises, conveyed the same to one Montgomery; that in October, 1876, said Jonas Spect borrowed from the defendant the sum of $2,200, and executed to her his promissory note therefor; that on the 2d day of January, 1877, he procured said Montgomery to convey the demanded premises to her, and that at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, an agreement was entered into between herself and said Jonas Spect declaring that said conveyance was made as security for the payment of said promissory note; "that by virtue of said conveyance from Montgomery, and said agreement, and by the consent of said Jonas Spect, defendant took possession of the demanded premises, and has ever since remained and is now in actual possession of the same, claiming them as her own: that no part of said $2,200 has ever been paid, principal or interest, but the whole thereof is now due and unpaid, amounting to $5,632;" and prayed judgment that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed. The action was tried by the court, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. The court made findings of the facts alleged in the complaint, and incorporated therein the following statement with reference to the equitable defense set up in the answer: "The court declines to find on the fact whether or not defendant has a mortgage lien on the premises in controversy, for the reason that the court is of the opinion that it is not necessary for the disposition of the issues involved in this case to find upon that matter, this being an action of ejectment, and the only question involved being the right to the possession of the premises described in plaintiff's complaint." The defendant has appealed directly from the judgment, and presents as a ground for its reversal that the court failed to find upon the issues presented by her equitable defense.

Inasmuch as the court gives as its reason

NOTE.—Mortgagee in possession, rights of.

If a mortgagee obtains possession in any lawful or peaceable mode he may retain it as against the mortgagor, or any person claiming under him subsequent to the mortgage, until the mortgage debt is paid, although no action is allowed by statute to recover possession. See note to Cook v. Cooper (Or.) 7 L. R. A. 273.

for not making findings upon these issues that such findings were immaterial, we must assume that evidence was introduced at the trial sufficient to support the allegations, and therefore the rule announced in Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, had no application. If the facts alleged by the defendant constitute a defense to the cause of action set forth in the complaint, they presented material issues upon which the court should have made findings, and a failure to do so was error which will require a reversal of the judgment.

The court does not find by what means the plaintiff became the owner of the demanded premises, but, as it is alleged in the equitable defense above named that Jonas Spect was the owner at the time he made the conveyance to Montgomery, we must assume that the plaintiff's title is derived under him, and is therefore subject to whatever incumbrance was created by the foregoing facts in favor of the defendant, and that the plaintiff can assert no greater rights to the premises than could Jonas Spect himself, were he the plaintiff herein. It may also be assumed, although it does not appear in the record that such point was presented to the court below, that the defendant's right of action upon the debt for which this mortgage was given to her was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The question to be determined is, "Can a mortgagor, who has placed his mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged premises, maintain ejectment against him while the debt for which the mortgage was given remains unsatisfied, even though an action by the mortgagee for the recovery of the debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations?"

Section 2927 of the Civil Code declares that "a mortgage does not entitle the mortgagee to the possession of the property, unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage, but after the execution of the mortgage the mortgagor may agree to such change of possession without a new consideration." The right of the mortgagee to take possession of the mortgaged premises does not depend upon the Statute. The mortgagor could at all times, even by a parol agreement, give to his mortgagee this additional security. Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589; Edwards v. Wray, 11 Biss. 251. In taking such possession the mortgagee does not thereby acquire any estate in the land, or obtain for his mortgage any higher character or any different or greater protection than it would otherwise have possessed. In any action to enforce the mortgage, or to collect the debt for which it was given as security, the mortgagee has no additional rights by reason of the fact that he is in possession of the mortgaged premises with the consent of the mortgagor. Such possession does, however, give him rights in addition to those conferred by the mortgage. It is an additional security for the debt, which he is entitled to retain in accordance with the terms under which it was received. This right to retain the possession of the land is not coincident with a right to foreclose his mortgage, or 18 L. R. A.

dependent upon such right, but depends solely upon the existence of the debt. The possession of the land is a special security for the debt, distinct and separate from the mortgage, which has been conferred by an act of the debtor, and the right to retain the same is independent of and distinct from any right springing from the mortgage.

A mortgage is defined by section 2920 of the Civil Code to be "a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act, without the necessity of a change of possession." The use of the term "hypothecate" signifies that possession is not an incident of the mortgage, and that the fact of possession is entirely distinct from the contract of hypothecation. When, therefore, in addition to the contract of hypothecation, the debtor gives to his creditor the possession of the mortgaged premises, he thereby, in addition to the mortgage which he has executed, pledges to him the land also as security for the debt, and confers upon him such rights as are incident to a pledge.

The common law recognized this species of landed security. It was there called cautum vivum, as distinguished from the cautum mortuum. This is defined by Chancellor Kent to be: "When the creditor takes the estate to hold and enjoy it without any limited time for redemption, and until he repays himself out of the rents and profits. In that case the land survives the debt, and when the debt is discharged the land by right of reverter returns to the original owner." 4 Kent, Com. 187, 2 Bl. Com. 157; Co. Litt. 205a. The holding of the land in pledge is like the holding of any other pledge. Until the debt is repaid the owner of the pledge cannot recover it from the creditor. The holder of personal property given as security for a debt is entitled to retain the same from the owner until the debt is satisfied, even though the Statute of Limitations has barred all right of action to recover the debt. Jones v. Merchants Bank of Albany, 4 Robt. 221. Under the same principle the mortgagee in possession is entitled to retain such possession until the debt is paid. "The mortgagee's right, being in possession, to defend himself against an ejectment by the mortgagor, is but a right to retain the possession of the pledge for the purpose of paying the debt. Such a right is but the incident of the debt, and has no relation to a title or estate in the lands." Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 364. "On the same principle that the party who holds goods in pledge for a debt may retain these goods, even after an action at law upon such debt has been barred, the party who has got rightful possession of land mortgaged may retain possession thereof until his debt is paid, although he can bring no action to enforce the debt." Henry v. Confidence G. & S. Min. Co. 1 Nev. 622. In Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 625, it is said: "When possession is taken by the mortgagee after condition broken by consent of the mortgagor, it will be presumed, in the absence of clear proof to the contrary, to be with the understanding that the mortgagee is to receive the rents and profits, and apply them to the payment of the debt secured. There is, indeed, no other good reason why the mortgagee should be let into possession in preference to any other party, and, unless a limitation to the period of possession is fixed at the time, it will be considered as extending until the satisfaction of the debt. Having thus entered, the mortgagee can hold against the mortgagor and all others until such satisfaction is obtained."

The rights which grow out of the relations existing between mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as the remedies for the enforcement and protection of those rights, are of equitable origin, and are to be determined by the principles of equity, whether the right be asserted or the remedy sought in an action at law or in equity. These principles, when once established, become the guidance of courts of law as well as of equity, even in those countries where the tribunals of law and equity are distinct. It was said by Lord Redesdale: "The distinction between strict law and equity is never in any country a permanent distinction. Law and equity are in continual progression, and the former is constantly gaining ground upon the latter. A great part of what is now strict law was formerly considered as equity, and the equitable decisions of this age will unavoidably be ranked under the strict law of the next." Section 807, Code Civil Proc., declares: "There is in this State but one form of civil actions for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs." While all distinctions in the form of actions are abolished, yet the principles upon which the rights of parties are to be determined remain to guide the judgment of the court. Courts look to the substantial rights of the parties for the purpose of determining the remedy to which they are entitled, irrespective of the form of the complaint under which the remedy is sought. Whenever a mortgagor seeks a remedy against his mortgagee which appears to the court to be inequitable, whether it be to cancel the mortgage as a cloud upon his title (Booth v. Hoakins, 75 Cal. 271), or to enjoin a sale under the power given by him in the security (Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298), or to recover from the mortgagee the possession of the mortgaged premises, the court will deny him the relief he seeks, except upon the condition that he shall do that which is consonant with equity. In accordance with these principles, it is a settled rule that a mortgagor cannot maintain ejectment against his mortgagee until the debt is paid. Phyfe v. Riley, 15 Wend. 248; Hubbell v. Moulson, 58 N. Y. 225; Fee v. Svingly, 6 Mont. 596; Roberts v. Sutherland, 4 Or. 220; Cooke v. Cooper, 18 Or. 142; 7 L. R. A. 278; Frink v. Le Roy, 49 Cal. 314; Tallman v. Ely, 6 Wis. 244; Brinkman v. Jones, 44 Wis. 512; Sahler v. Signer, 44 Barb. 614; Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Oliver St. Baptist Church, 73 N. Y. 82; Den v. Wright, 7 N. J. L. 212; Wells v. Van Dyke, 109 Pa. 335; Duks v. Reed, 64 Tex. 705; 1 Jones, Mortg. § 715.

The debt is not satisfied or paid by mere lapse of time. The Statute of Limitations is a bar to the remedy only, and does not extinguish, or even impair, the obligation of the debtor. It is available in judicial proceedings only as a defense, and can never be asserted as a cause of action in his behalf, or for conferring upon him a right of action. It is to be used as a shield and not as a sword. "It has never been held that the expiration of the statutory time for bringing an action to recover a debt, or to enforce any personal obligation, operated either as an extinguishment or payment. Such a result cannot be derived from the language of our Statute, the reason or policy of the law, or the decisions of courts in this State or elsewhere." Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 301.

The mortgagee, after the mortgage debt has been barred by the Statute of Limitations, cannot, by any affirmative proceedings on his part, invoke the aid of the court for the collection of the debt; but, if the mortgagor has placed him in the possession of the land mortgaged, he does not lose the right thus conferred upon him, and can resist any action by the mortgagor to deprive him of this security.

In Frink v. Le Roy, 49 Cal. 314, a decree of foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises was entered in 1859. Thereupon Le Roy, one of the mortgagees, took possession of the premises under an agreement between the parties that he might do so, and apply the rents to the satisfaction of the judgment. In 1870, Frink, who had succeeded to the interest of the mortgagor in the premises, brought an action in ejectment against Le Roy for their recovery. Le Roy, in his answer, by way of equitable defense, set up the mortgage, the judgment foreclosing the same, and the agreement under which he had taken possession. To this defense the plaintiff pleaded the Statute of Limitations. Upon an appeal from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the supreme court held that the Statute of Limitations had no application, and that Le Roy's right to remain in possession under the agreement was not affected by it, saying that "the equity of Le Roy to be maintained in possession until satisfaction of the debt is not lost from the fact that for upwards of ten years he has been in the actual possession of that of which he is now sought to be deprived." In Hubbell v. Moulson, 58 N. Y. 225, it was held that the mortgagor could not maintain an action in ejectment against the mortgagee for the mortgaged premises, even though he could prove at the trial that the mortgagee had received from the lands sufficient rents and profits to satisfy the debt; that such receipt did not ipso facto satisfy the mortgage and discharge its lien, but was in the nature of an equitable set-off to the amount due upon the mortgage debt; and that until after a judicial determination had been had upon an accounting in equity, and the application of these receipts decreed by the court in satisfaction of the debt, the mortgage was not satisfied. Section 846, Code Civil Proc., provides that "an action to redeem a mortgage of real property, with or without an account of rents and profits, may be brought by the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, against the mortgagee in possession, or those claiming under him, unless he or they have continuously maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage." If the mortgagor could maintain ejectment against his mortgagee, after the debt for which the mortgage was given had become barred by the Statute of Limitations, he would have no need to bring an action to redeem the mortgage; and, if the mortgagee had maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after the breach of some condition of the mortgage, such adverse possession would be a complete defense to the action of ejectment. Mere lapse of time does not constitute adverse possession, but, if the mortgagor could maintain ejectment as soon as the right of action upon the debt was barred by the Statute of Limitations, the provisions of this section would be meaningless.

It follows, from a consideration of the principles which we have herein stated, that the equitable defense alleged by the defendant was, if sustained by proofs, sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery; and that the failure of the court to make findings upon the issues so presented was error, for which the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

ERROR to the District Court for Webster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of warranty of the soundness of certain horses. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meers, Dilworth, Smith & Dilworth for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. N. Richards, for defendant in error:

It is no objection to a petition that the amount of damages has been increased, provided there is not a departure and provided the increase does not go beyond the jurisdiction of the court from which appeal was taken.

Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ogilvy, 18 Neb. 638.

Plaintiff in error filed his answer to the petition and thereby waived the objection if it was otherwise good.

School Dist. No. 36 v. McIntie, 14 Neb. 50; Waters v. Reuben, 16 Neb. 101.

If the note had been sold then the vendee could recover without paying it.

The insolvency of the vendee is immaterial.

Thoreson v. Minneapolis Harvester Works, 29 Minn. 341.

The fact that the buyer of a warranted article gives his note for it, which has not been paid when he brings his action upon the warranty, does not affect the extent of his damages, neither is the sum which the buyer is entitled to recover for breach of warranty limited by the price which he paid or agreed to pay for the article warranted.

Frohreich v. Gammon, 28 Minn. 476.

It was not necessary that the vendor knew the warranty made by him was false.

Dunbar v. Briggs, 18 Neb. 97.

Cobb, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was originally brought September 10, 1886, in the county court of said county, by Joseph Baker against George J. Volland, claiming that on March 22, 1884, he purchased a team of horses of the defendant for $350, which defendant warranted to be sound and free from disease; that he thoroughly relied on said warranty, and believed the same to be true, and alleged that said representation and warranty were false and untrue in that one of said horses had a disease akin to glanders, commonly called "button farcy," and was of no value, and to the damage of the plaintiff to the amount of $175. That on account of the disease of said horse it was communicated to another horse of his, without any neglect or fault of his, and the same was damaged to the sum of $100. That he lay out the use of said horses, and incurred necessary expenses in attempting to doctor and cure the same, in the sum of $100; and that he has incurred damages in all to the sum of $375. That he gave said Volland his note for the sum of $350, payable March 1, 1885, and that before the maturity of said note the said G. Volland sold the same to Benjamin F. Smith, and that said Smith recovered a judgment in the County Court of Webster County for the sum of $437.50 and $11.50 costs, and that said judgment is in full force and effect. The case being appealed to the district court, the defendant in error filed his petition, setting forth the same state of facts, but claiming $200 damages by reason of the disease being communicated to other horses, and claimed $100 damages for expenses in doctoring said horses. In the district court the plaintiff in error filed a motion to strike out of the petition in the second cause the sum of $100, for the reason the same was not claimed in the county court; and also to strike out the fourth item of damages, for the reason that the same was not claimed in the county court,—which motion was overruled. The plaintiff in error also filed answer, admitting that the defendant in error purchased the horses for the sum of $350, but denied that the horses were warranted in any manner; and further alleged that the note given for the horses was transferred to B. F. Smith, and that said B. F. Smith recovered a judgment in the County Court of Webster County for the sum of $437.50 and $11.50 costs; and that an execution was issued on said judgment and returned "No goods;" and that said judgment remains in full force and wholly unpaid; and that defendant in error had never paid anything on said note or the judgment; and that said defendant in error, Baker, and the party signing said note as surety, were insolvent, and nothing could be collected from them. The case was tried to a jury, who returned a verdict for the defendant in error and against the plaintiff in error for the sum of $275, with interest at 7 per cent from March 24, 1885; total principal and interest, $345.58. The motion for a new trial was overruled, and the cause brought to this court on the following errors: first, that the district court erred in refusing to strike out the fourth item of damage in the plaintiff's petition, for the reason that no such claim was tried in the county court; second, that the court erred in refusing to give instruction No. 1, asked for by the plaintiff; third, that the court erred in giving instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

The first error assigned is overruled, for the reason that it has been held, and is a settled rule, that, "where an action is brought in the county court and appealed, an amended petition in the district court may claim an amount of damages equal to that of the jurisdiction of the county court." Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ogilvy, 18 Neb. 638. The amendment embracing the fourth item of damages is an extension of the original claim merely, and within the jurisdiction of the county court. It could have been made there, and was competent to be made on appeal.

The second error is that of the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that "the plaintiff could not recover unless they found that he had paid the value of the horse, or the agreed price thereof." The promissory note of the plaintiff having gone to a second holder, and having gone into judgment at law, it is not clear that the court should have enforced this rule. In the case cited as a precedent,—that of Aultman v. Jett, 42 Wis. 488,—there is a clear intimation that if the notes had been sold the vendee could have recovered. Cole, J., in the opinion, said: "There is, however, no evidence that the notes have been transferred; and, in the absence of all proof upon the point, the presumption is that they are still held by the plaintiff. If the notes still belong to the plaintiff, they cannot be treated as payment of the contract price, unless it was so agreed at the time." This rule had been adopted in the courts of Wisconsin, and was adhered to; but Ryan, Ch. J., took occasion to say "that, if the question of payment were a new one in this court, he could not concur in the rule; and that his opinion was, when one contracts a debt, and presently gives his note or other obligation for the amount, it ought to be considered a payment, unless there be express agreement to the contrary."

In the case of Sycamore Marsh Harvester Mfg. Co. v. Sturm, 13 Neb. 210, cited as precedent, the reason the recovery must be limited to the amount paid is that the warranty was in writing, and by its terms the vendee's damages were limited to the amount paid on the contract of sale.

In the action of Dunbar v. Briggs, 13 Neb. 382, suit was brought in the District Court of Gage County on the defendant's promissory note for $900 in payment for thirty-nine head of Texas horses, diseased, which infected other horses, and on which note there was a recovery in full. This judgment was reversed on error. The damages were not limited by contract, but the warranty of soundness was questioned, and testimony on that point improperly overruled.

In the case of Long v. Clapp, 15 Neb. 417, it was laid down that, "in addition to the general measure of damages, the law in some cases imposes upon a party injured from another's breach of contract or tort the active duty of making reasonable exertions to render the injury as light as possible. Where this duty has been found to exist, the labor and expense involved in its performance are chargeable to the party liable for the injury thus mitigated." This rule seems to be directly apposite to the recovery by the defendant in error on the veterinary surgeon's account for services. Beyond this, there can be no contention as to the measure of damages in the court below, if the jury were not misled as to the price of the diseased horse and the value of the colt lost from infection. The testimony does not indicate that they were so misled. As to the general principle that the buyer of a horse, or the purchaser of a patented machine, both warranted, has right of action under the warranty, and a counterclaim for breach of warranty, whether the purchase was by cash or promise, or whether the vendee be solvent or insolvent, can hardly be questioned in this State. The assumption is that, an execution having been returned against a judgment debtor unsatisfied for want of goods and chattels, is not Q. E. D. that he would remain insolvent, and never pay his creditors; for by industry and good luck he may become solvent, and discharge his pecuniary obligations. That fact, of itself, was to be considered by the vendor preceding this transaction.

Nor is the proposition in this case confined to the judicial practice of this State.

In Thoreson v. Minneapolis Harvester Works,

29 Minn. 841, it was held: "In an action to recover damages for breach of warranty in the sale of a chattel a recovery may be had, although the vendee had not paid the purchase price, but had given his promissory notes therefor, which are still unpaid." Prior to this decision, the Supreme Court of Minnesota had held in the case of Frohreich v. Gammon, 28 Minn. 476, that "the fact that the buyer of a warranted article gives his note for it, which has not been paid when he brings his action upon the warranty, does not affect the extent of his damage. Neither is the sum which the buyer is entitled to recover for breach of warranty limited by the price which he paid or agreed to pay for the articles."

From a careful reading of the evidence, and from the fair and impartial instructions of the court, we are not able to find reversible errors in the trial in the court below.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.
The other Judges concur.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

J. Gardner KENYON, Appt.,

v.

Robert KNIPE et al.

(.... Wash.)

A purchaser of lots according to a plat showing them bounded by a definite line at a specified distance from the front boundary acquires no riparian rights in lands covered by tide-water at the rear of such lots, at least where the plat shows an alley and other lots beyond such line.

(June 2, 1891.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the District Court for King County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin the maintenance by defendants of a wharf in tide-water in front of complainant's premises. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. J. B. Howe, with Messrs. D. O. Finch, E. C. Hughes and J. Gardner Kenyon, in propria persona, for appellant:

A. A. Denny, as owner of a certain donation land claim abutting on the navigable waters of Elliott Bay, was exclusively possessed of the riparian rights incident to the bank.

Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406; Brunswick v. Union Depot & St. R. & Transp. Co. 81 Minn. 297; Hansford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 723, 43 Minn. 104; Lyon v. Jefferies, 40 Fed. Rep. 386; Menasha Wooden Ware Co. v. Lawson, 70 Wis. 600; Everson v. Waseca, 44 Minn. 247; 2 Parsons, Cont. 7th ed. § 508, notes 2 and 3.

Appellant, by deed executed by said Denny and wife, in pursuance of said instrument of NORM.—Map, when controlling in the description of a deed.

Where a recital of the deed makes special reference to some particular map, plat, or tracing for the monuments, courses and distances of the realty conveyed, such map, plat or tracing becomes a part of the deed of conveyance by which the limits of the property conveyed may be determined. Thomas v. Patten, 13 Me. 329; Kennebec Purchase Proprietors v. Tiffany, 1 Me. 219; Shirras v. Caig, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 48, 3 L. ed. 265; Farnsworth v. Taylor, 9 Gray, 162; Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 207; Stetson v. Dow, 16 Gray, 374; Fox v. Union Sugar Ref. Co. 109 Mass. 292; Chamberlain v. Bradley, 101 Mass. 191; Birmingham v. Anderson, 40 Pa. 506; McCausland v. Fleming, 63 Pa. 38; Spiller v. Scribner, 38 Vt. 247; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 232.

Where a plan is referred to in a deed, as containing a description of an estate, the courses, distances and other particulars appearing upon the plan are to be as much regarded in ascertaining the true description of the estate, and the intent of the parties in making it, as if they had been expressly recited and enumerated in the deed. Morgan v. Moore, 8 Gray, 319; Lunt v. Holland, 14 Mass. 149; Davis v. Rainsford, supra; Parker v. Bennett, 11 Allen, 388; Murdock v. Chapman, 9 Gray, 156.

Independent of statutory regulation, the law is well settled that "where a deed refers to a map or plan, its lines, courses, etc., are to be regarded as 18 L. R. A.

expressly mentioned in the deed, whether actually annexed or not." 2 Hilliard, Real Prop. 366, § 108; Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 211; Lunt v. Holland, supra; Doe v. Cullum, 4 Ala. 576; Thomas v. Hatch, 8 Sumn. 180; Thomas v. Patten, 13 Me. 329; Blaney v. Rice, 20 Pick. 62; Harris v. Maxwell, 4 Dev. & B. L. 242; Llewellyn v. Jersey, 11 Mees. & W. 188; Taylor v. Parry, 1 Man. & G. 604; Otis v. Moulton, 20 Me. 205; Heaton v. Hodges, 14 Me. 66; Magoun v. Lap- ham, 21 Pick. 135; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Real Prop. 223.

Where lots are conveyed with express reference to a recorded plat, evidence to control, or in any way affect the plat, is inadmissible in ejectment. If there was any error or mistake in this reference by way of description of the premises, the remedy was in chancery, to reform the deed. Jones v. Johnston, 59 U. S. 18 How. 160, 15 L. ed. 320.

So long as that remained unreformed, the description of the lot by reference to the plat was conclusive upon the parties. It is not material that the plat recorded did not conform to the requirements of the Statute. The title passed by the deed, whether the plat conformed or not. Ibid.

A map made for, and mentioned in, the deeds of the respective parcels from the former owner of the whole premises under which the plaintiff and defendants respectively derive their title, is properly received in evidence, for the purpose of showing the actual location of that line. Kingsland v. Chittenden, 8 Lans. 15.

sale, became owner of the legal title to said bank lots and possessed of all the riparian rights which said A. A. Denny, at the time he was owner of said bank lots, had as incident to said bank.

Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., Lyon v. Fishmonger's Co. and Barlow v. Wingate, supra.

Denny could not sever the riparian rights from the ownership of the bank, and when Denny sold and plaintiff acquired title to the bank, Denny parted with all riparian rights and privileges incident to the bank, and appellant acquired the same.

Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406; Brunswick v. Union Depot St. R. & Transp. Co. 31 Minn. 297; Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 722, 43 Minn. 104; Lyon v. Fishmonger's Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662; Barlow v. Wingate, 2d Jud. Dist. Wash. Terr.; Musser v. Hershey, 42 Iowa, 362; Phillips v. Rhodes, 7 Met. 322; Delaplatine v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 226.

Appellant, as owner of bank lots abutting on the navigable waters of Elliott Bay, is now exclusively entitled to the right of erecting and maintaining wharves, piers and other like structures upon his said lots and extending said wharves and piers to the deep waters of Elliott Bay.

Laws of Washington, 1854, p. 857; Wash. Terr. Code, § 3271; Case v. Loftus, 5 L. R. A. 684, 39 Fed. Rep. 784; Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, Brunswick v. Union Depot St. R. & Transp. Co., Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., Lyon v. Fishmonger's Co. and Barlow v. Wingate, supra.

The title of Denny extended only to high-water mark of the waters of Elliott Bay, and his attempt to plat lots, blocks, streets and alleys below that line was a nullity and no one could acquire any right by such void act.

Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, supra; Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Brunswick v. Union Depot St. R. & Transp. Co. and Barlow v. Wingate, supra; Shively v. Parker, 9 Or. 505.

Neither appellant, appellees nor A. A. Denny himself could be bound by said plat except so far as the same was a part of said Denny's donation claim, because no person could be bound by such void and vain act.

Cleveland v. Choate, 77 Cal. 73; Barlow v. Wingate, supra; Jones v. Johnston, 59 U. S. 18 How. 150, 15 L. ed. 320; Gould, Waters, p. 541; Ruge v. Appalachicola O. C. & F. Co. 25 Fla. 656; Ricard v. Williams, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 109, 5 L. ed. 410; Shively v. Parker, supra.

Appellant is not estopped by said attempted platting of the sea by Denny from claiming as owner of bank lots all the riparian rights incident to such bank lots.

Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406; Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 722, 43 Minn. 104; Lyon v. Fishmonger's Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662; Barlow v. Wingate, 2d Jud. Dist. Wash. Terr.; Welles v. Bailey, 4 New Eng. Rep. 841, 55 Conn. 292.

Appellees have not and could not have any title to alleged lots 5 and 8 because they are below the ordinary high-water mark of the waters of Elliott Bay, a navigable arm of the sea, where there could be no presumption of title.

Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Barlow v. Wingate, supra.

The obstructions complained of by appellant are situated in front of appellant's bank lots, below the line of ordinary high tide in the navigable waters of Elliott Bay, between the appellant's bank lots and the deep waters of said bay, and are therefore nuisances causing special and irreparable damage and injury to appellant and his said property.

Mr. Andrew Woods, with Messrs. Thomas Burke and C. H. Hanford, for appellees:

The right of a shore owner to wharf out and build warehouses and to collect wharfage, etc., is a valuable franchise and may be sold like any other species of property, and is severable from the upland.

The riparian rights of the original owner of the upland can be transferred to any owner of upland, in connection with which the said riparian rights can be used and enjoyed, though the tide land does not directly abut upon the upland of the latter owner.

When such a law as Act of 1854 is acted upon by the riparian owner or his grantee, it invests him with certain rights and with a license to erect and maintain wharves, warehouses, etc., to such an extent as does not interfere with public rights, and this license, when executed, becomes irrevocable.

tention to reserve his riparian rights, and to sever them from the land adjoining the shore.

The alley between lots 6 and 7 and lots 5 and 8, all his interest in which had been dedicated by A. A. Denny to the public, became a public street, and has been for years, and now is, used as such, and the center line of this alley bounds the land and all interest of the appellant to the westward.

Even if the appellant ever had any rights beyond the two lots purchased by him, he must, by his long-continued failure to assert any claim to the tide land to the westward, and by his silence for so long a time, be deemed to have acquiesced in the conveyance to and the possession of said land by the appellees and their grantors; and after many and costly improvements have been put upon said land, with his knowledge, and while he is silent, he is now estopped from setting up any claim in himself to such land, or to any interest therein.

Hoyt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The discussion in this case has extended over a broad range. Nearly every question connected with the subject of tide or shore lands, and the rights of riparian or littoral proprietors thereto, has been ably briefed and argued by counsel for the respective parties. Also the questions growing out of the making and recording of town plats, and the effect of the same, have been likewise presented. The conclusions to which we have come as to this second matter will make it unnecessary for us to decide the questions presented by the former, and, as they have been lately considered by this court in cases where a decision thereof was necessary, we shall here say nothing in regard thereto. The facts, so far as they are necessary to the decision of this case, are substantially as follows: Arthur A. Denny made and recorded his plat of an addition to the City of Seattle, upon which certain lots, streets and alleys appeared, and were sufficiently described to show the intention of the maker of the plat in regard thereto. It nowhere appeared upon such plat where the line of ordinary high tide was. On the contrary, so far as could be gathered therefrom, all the territory covered by said plat was upland. As a matter of fact, however, the line of ordinary high tide so crossed said plat that a portion of lots 6 and 7, hereinafter mentioned, were above the line of ordinary high tide, and the remainder of such lots, and all of lots 5 and 8, together with the alley dividing the same, were below such line. After the making and recording of said plat the said Denny sold and conveyed to plaintiff herein lots 6 and 7, in block B, of said plat, after which said Denny sold and conveyed lots 5 and 8, in said block, and said defendants, by mesne conveyances, became possessed of the title thereby conveyed. Under said last-named conveyance from Denny, possession was taken and improvements made on said lots 5 and 8, and the alley dividing those lots from the lots of plaintiff was planked over and used as a street several years before the commencement of this action. Under these circumstances we do not think it lies in the mouth of the plaintiff to object to such improvements as being an infringement upon his rights as a littoral proprietor. The effect of the plat made by Mr. Denny was to separate the tract thereby covered into distinct lots having definite, ascertained boundaries, and into streets and alleys as marked upon said plat, and to vest in the public such streets and alleys for the purposes therein designated. That such would be the effect as to such streets and alleys if the territory covered was upland, and owned by said Denny, is conceded, but it is contended that, as he had no title to the land below the line of ordinary high tide, his plat, so far as it purported to cover such lands, was absolutely void for any and every purpose. With this contention we cannot agree so far as Mr. Denny himself is concerned. It is perhaps true that as to anybody having rights adverse to him such would be the effect, but it does not lie in his mouth to say that that which he has made of record is a nullity. He is estopped by the making of such plat from alleging its invalidity, and so far as he is concerned would not be heard to complain of the use by the public of the territory covered by streets and alleys, especially after the same had been taken possession of and improvements thereon made. This being the condition of Mr. Denny, and his relation to the title of the lots bounded and described in said plat, we think that one purchasing lots from him, by reference to said plat, could acquire no better title than he had. Of course, if one could acquire title independent of or adverse to that represented by Mr. Denny at the time of the making of the plat this reasoning would not obtain; but such is not the condition of plaintiff. Whatever title he has he obtained from Mr. Denny, and we think it elementary that under the circumstances of this case he could get no better title than that of his grantor. A deed conveying property by reference to a plat, or map thereof, adopts such plat or map as a part of such deed, and one purchasing thereunder becomes bound by the boundaries of the lot purchased as they appear on said plat or map. Applying this rule to the case at bar, it will be seen that the plaintiff herein did not purchase lots bounded by tide-water, but those bounded by a definite and defined line 120 feet from the front of said lots, so that the lots he purchased were bounded and concluded on the one side by Front Street, and on the other side by the alley next westerly thereof, and we think he is estopped by such fact from claiming any rights beyond such boundaries as against the rights of the public in said alley, and of those in possession of the lots beyond such alley. Unaided by such plat, his deed is uncertain and void. Aided by it, it becomes a valid deed, but of a lot with definite boundaries, and he must be bound thereby. It follows that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed for, and the decision of the lower court in so holding must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Stiles, J., dissenting:

Both parties in this case assumed that the riparian right of wharfage existed when the action was commenced. Substantially their only difference on that subject was that the appellant took the position that such rights were not severable from the ownership of the upland excepting by a conveyance clearly showing that to be the purpose of the grantor. The appellee, on the other hand, claimed that any deed describing upland, or upland and shore land, by metes and bounds, though the high-water mark in either case should be the actual boundary, was sufficient for the severance of the right of wharfage and access to the sea from the upland. From the opinion of the court it does not appear clearly, as the fact was, that the land owned by Denny constituted a mere strip of some forty feet in width between Front Street on the east and the line of mean high water on the west. This strip seems to have been a remnant left after the original plat of lands owned by Denny had been filed, and which he thereafter undertook to subdivide into lots. His plat was in the usual form, and had nothing upon it which indicated that there was any navigable water embraced within its limits. To the westward of the line of high water, and 120 feet from Front Street, he noted on his plat what appeared to be an open strip, but without any designation upon it that it was to be an alley, and to the westward of that other lots were noted, and numbered the same as those which embraced the upland. Kenyon met Denny in Olympia, before the former had ever seen the plat, and spoke to him about the purchase of some of his "water lots." Denny told him he would reserve him two. Afterwards, in pursuance of this conversation, Denny executed to Kenyon a conveyance of lots 6 and 7 in one of these platted blocks. Across these lots, from north to south, the meander line extended. It does not appear whether Kenyon had at any time seen Denny's plat. Kenyon went into possession of the two lots by his tenant, and erected upon the lots, and extending therefrom over the shore some 60 feet, a building on piles, and used the building thus erected to the time of the commencement of this suit. The appellee took from Denny a quitclaim deed of lots 5 and 8 on the same plat, which lots were immediately to the westward and in front of the lots of the appellant. The appellee thereafter (and just when is not discernible) extended southward from other lots, in the same block which he had purchased from Denny in like manner, a wharf over the area of lots 5 and 8. This action was brought to abate what appellant conceived to be both a public and a private nuisance in front of his lots and of his building and premises. I am unable to understand upon what principle, in the light of the decision of this court in the case of Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 2 Wash. —, 12 L. R. A. 632, the position is now taken that the appellant's main contention was not a good one. In that case it was decided: first, that a riparian owner now has no rights whatever as against the State or its grantee or licensee beyond the boundary of his land; and, secondly, that the Act of 1854 was merely a permissive license which is not available unless it had been taken advantage of by the shore owner before the adoption of the Constitution. This ruling denies any claim that Denny might have had that he had any right whatever beyond his shore line, excepting as a licensee, under the Act of 1854. He took no advantage of that license, and had no title, interest or claim whatever in the waters or the soil beneath them beyond the line of his land at the time he filed his plat. His plat, therefore, was utterly void for every purpose as to all that part of it which extended beyond the upland; and now to say that, notwithstanding he was not the owner of any land beyond the water line, nevertheless he could, by the mere filing of a plat, exercise an authority which would not only dedicate a street or alley out in the water, but also reserve to himself a title or a right still further in the water, which he could convey to a grantee by a quitclaim deed, is incomprehensible to me. It was not decided, nor do I think it was intended to be intimated, in the case of Eisenbuch v. Hatfield, that the owner of upland, who had availed himself of the Act of 1854 by erecting a structure in the nature of a wharf from his land into the water, could not prevent a mere stranger, such as was the appellee, who confessedly acquired no title whatever from Denny, from creating a nuisance in front of him towards the deep water. The effect of this decision is to say that Denny, by his mere plat, could set aside the Act of 1854, and, while giving to Kenyon more than the Act of 1854 contemplated up to the west line of his lots, could absolutely deprive him from going therefrom to the deep water. In a word, this court, having rejected all forms of riparian rights, now concedes to a shore owner prior to the Constitution rights which have never been conceded to him outside of Rhode Island and Minnesota, where he is said to have substantially the whole title to deep water.

I think the court is entirely mistaken as to the effect of such a plat. Section 2328 and following sections of the Code do not say who may make or file a plat of a town, but simply provide that whoever shall thereafter lay off any town shall, previous to the sale of any lots, record a plat, and that the effect of such a plat shall be to all intents and purposes the same as a quitclaim deed. Now, it is the first principle of platting, that the one who plats must be the owner in fee of the land platted. Says Angell on Highways (§ 182): "Dedication is an appropriation of land to some public use, made by the owner of the fee;" and in section 184: "A primary condition of every valid dedication is that it shall be made by the owner of the fee." Herman on Estoppel (§ 1148), says: "A primary condition of every valid dedication is that it shall be made by the owner of the fee, or of an estate therein." In Lee v. Lake, 14 Mich. 12, Judge Cooley said: "The plat put in evidence was made by Brooks and Crane at a time when they do not appear to have had any interest in the land, and if the execution [of the plat] had been in all respects in due form it could not have had the effect which the Statute gives to plats executed and acknowledged under its provisions. The Statute then in force provided for the making, acknowledging and recording of town plats by the proprietors, and it is impossible to give the peculiar statutory effect of a present conveyance to a plat made by persons who at the time had no title to convey, even though they may have afterwards become the owners. And as the Healing Act of 1850 was confined in its scope to imperfect acknowledgments, it could not give effect to a plat which no acknowledgment could have made effectual at the time it was made." This decision was concurred in by Judges Christianity and Campbell.

The case of Hoole v. Atty-Gen., 22 Ala. 190, is considered a leading case upon this subject, and therein the court held not only that it must be the owner of the fee who could make a lawful dedication which the State even could take advantage of, but that if the land, at the time of the attempted dedication, was covered by a mortgage, the mortgagor could not dedicate without the acquiescence of the mortgagee.

In Baugin v. Mann, 59 Ill. 492, which was an injunction to prevent one who held title under Sprague, who, it was alleged, had dedicated an alley in the rear of appellee's premises, it was said: "The evidence fails to show title in Sprague. Unless he owned the fee he could make no dedication to public use. A primary condition of every valid dedication is that it must be made by the owner of the fee." In Porter v. Stone, 51 Iowa, 373, the court said: "The party who lays out a town-site, the effect of which is to donate to the public streets, alleys and public grounds, must of necessity have some title to the property to be affected by his act. A grant to the public is not established by simply showing that a town-site has been laid out. The party claiming benefits of a grant must go further, and show the title of the party laying out the town, and thus undertaking to make the grant." In Leland v. Portland, 2 Or. 47, where the question was whether a dedication of land in front of the City of Portland, between the Willamette River and the westerly side of the street, which was made before September 27, 1850, was of any validity, the court said: "The next question presented is, Did the court below err in refusing to instruct the jury that a dedication of the property in question, to be binding, and to divert the title from the donor to the public, must have been since the 27th day of September, 1850? I regard this question as settled by the case of Lounsedale v. Parrish, 62 U. S. 21 How. 290, 15 L. ed. 80, which case arose on the question of the dedication of the levee in the same City of Portland, and by these same proprietors of a town-site, and was governed by the same considerations in this respect as govern this case, where it was held that a dedication made prior to Act of September 27, 1850, was void for want of any title in the donors at the time of dedication, the title then being in the United States." In England the rule has been the same, the leading case being Wood v. Veal, 5 Barn. & Ald. 454, where it was held that a tenant for ninety-nine years could make no dedication to the public, nor could anyone else excepting the owner in fee.

The latest case upon this subject, and one which is almost exactly the same as the case at bar, is that of Ruge v. Apalachicola Oyster C. & F. Co., 25 Fla. 656. It seems that the original plat of the City of Apalachicola, located on the bay of that name, showed an open space, which was denominated on the plat "Florida Promenade," and it was contended by the owner of land in the neighborhood that the dedication of the promenade carried with it the right to the public to have the waters of the bay in front kept clear of all obstructions. The court said: "The dedication of the promenade by the Apalachicola Land Company was more than fifty years ago. What right had the company to make a dedication extending into the bay? Even if the promenade reached the bay, the company had no right in the submerged lands thereof, and could not dedicate these. Admitting that accretions to the soil of the promenade had become a part of it, that was a contingency which did not authorize the dedication of lands under the water in front of the promenade."

Denny's plat was good to the water's edge. Beyond that it was void. Even Denny himself was not estopped to say as much. In such cases there is no question of estoppel. The real question is, Do the facts show a dedication either statutory or common law?

Hayes v. Livingston, 84 Mich. 394. Having had absolutely no title, or shadow or claim of title, the maker of the plat was free to deny it at any time, and so could any of his grantees of the upland, although their deeds purported to convey something which had an existence. Perhaps, on the whole case, the judgment of the court is right, however, as there was evidence tending to show laches on the part of Kenyon in prosecuting his suit for injunction until the structures he complained of had been erected and used for a considerable period, and on this ground I can concur.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT,

Board of SCHOOL COMMISSIONERS of the City OF INDIANAPOLIS et al., Appts.,

STATE of Indiana, ex rel. Theodore SANDER.

(....Ind....)

The teaching of the German language in "any school of a township, town, or city," which is required by Rev. Stat. 1881; § 4497, on demand of the parents or guardians of twenty-five or more children, cannot be restricted by the board of school commissioners of a city to schools of certain grades, but may be compelled in any place in the city where a public school is taught with its complement of teachers and scholars.

(McBride and Olds, JJ., dissent.)

(June 28, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of relator in a proceeding instituted to compel the making of provision for the teaching of the German language in School No. 22, in the City of Indianapolis. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan & Smith for appellants.
Messrs. L. B. Swift and W. P. Fishback for appellee.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding by mandate to compel the Board of School Commissioners of the City of Indianapolis to introduce the German language as a branch of study into School No. 22, upon the demand of parents and guardians of children in attendance upon that school.

The action was predicated upon § 4497, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Acts 1869, p. 40), which reads as follows: "The common schools of the State shall be taught in the English language; and the trustee shall provide to have taught in them orthography, reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, English grammar, physiology, history of the United States, and good behavior, and such other branches of learning and other languages as the advancement of pupils may require and 18 L. R. A.

the trustees from time to time direct. And whenever the parents or guardians of twenty-five or more children in attendance at any school of a township, town or city shall so demand, it shall be the duty of the school trustee or trustees of said township, town or city to procure efficient teachers and introduce the German language as a branch of study into such schools; and the tuition in said schools shall be without charge: provided, such demand is made before the teacher for said district is employed."

The verified petition for the alternative writ alleges, in substance, the following facts: That one of the schools of the City, under the management of said Board of School Commissioners, is a school known as Public School No. 22. That the school year of the City extends from September in each year to June of the following year. That before any teachers for said school were procured or employed for the coming year, the parents and guardians of one hundred and twelve children in attendance at said school petitioned and demanded of the appellant Board that it procure and employ efficient teachers and introduce the German language, as a branch of study, into said school for the coming school year. That said Board refused to grant said demand, but went on and employed teachers to teach all the other branches required by law in said school, and still other branches not required by law; but all the time refused to provide for teaching the German language in said school. The petition to the Board was set out in full with the names of the children and wards. This suit was begun June 21, 1890.

To this the appellants answered, that, prior to the filing of the demand for the teaching of German, said Board, having considered the grading of the Indianapolis schools and the course of instruction therein, and the teaching of German therein, and the employment of teachers therefor, and what branches required by the advancement of pupils should be taught in addition to the statutory branches, all, in connection with the revenues, had determined that German should be taught, and could be efficiently taught for the last seven years of the twelve years' course of said Indianapolis schools; that the revenues of the Board would not permit the teaching of German to a greater extent, and the Board had determined to employ teachers for the last seven years of the course; that the Board had graded the schools; that it had erected buildings in various parts of the City convenient of access to pupils, and had so arranged that pupils in lower grades could attend school nearer home, while those in higher grades, being older and fewer in number, attended at buildings more remotely located; that the number of pupils attending in the last seven years of the course was 5,846, and would be greater the coming year; that the estimated revenue for the coming year would be $252,973, of which amount $210,000 would be required for tuition under the present plan of the Board; that Public School No. 22 had been erected upon these principles, and that for many years no pupils advanced beyond the fifth year of the school course have attended or been taught in said school building; that none of the pupils mentioned in the petition for teaching German in said school No. 22 have advanced to the sixth grade, and therefore they are not entitled to enter classes where German is taught; that as soon as said pupils reach the sixth year they will go to buildings where German is taught, and may there study it; that with the revenue at command there is no other feasible method of grading the schools of Indianapolis.

To this answer the appellee replied, that for many years the City has been subdivided for general school purposes by the Board by erecting school buildings throughout the City to which children living near have been assigned for attendance according to the grades taught; that whatever have been the grades taught it has been the custom of parents and guardians to file petitions for the teaching of German like the petition filed with the complaint for the teaching of German in public school No. 22; that the Board has complied with said petitions and has introduced the German language accordingly; that until the recent refusal of the Board, it was supposed by the community that it would continue such compliance; that at a meeting of the Board in June, 1890, it had, on motion, refused to provide for any teaching of the German language in any of the schools of said City during the coming school year; that 2,000 children desired to study the German language, but under the plan of the Board, as described in the answer, only 800 of these could do so; that the Board, while refusing to provide for teaching the German language, proposed to provide for teaching the following branches not required by law, at an expense out of the school revenues, as follows:

Music, $13,000; drawing, $16,000; manual training, $1,800; physical training, $3,000; chemistry, $1,000; physics, $2,000; Greek, ; book-keeping, $500; geometry, $1,000; English literature, $2,000; general history, $500; algebra, $8,000; Latin, $1,000; training school for teachers, $1,500; civil government, $800; rhetoric, $2,000; botany, $500.

That physical training is a new branch of study which the Board intends to introduce for the coming school year; that if the teaching of German were provided for by the Board wherever demands like the one in the complaint have been made, the same would cost not to exceed $10,000 for the coming school year; that the number of pupils in the grades comprising the first five years of the schools during the past year was 11,941, and will be greater during the coming year.

To this reply the appellants demurred for want of facts; the demurrer was overruled and exception taken. After trial a judgment was entered directing the mandamus to issue. The appellants appealed, and the only error assigned is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the reply.

The claim is made by the appellee that the only question presented by the record is as to the power of the appellants, in their discretion, to refuse to introduce the study of the German language into any of the public schools of the City, notwithstanding the filing of a proper petition therefor by the requisite number of parents and guardians. This claim is founded upon the allegation in the reply, that at the meeting of the Board held in June, 1890, a motion, providing for the teaching of German in all the schools of the City in which proper petitions were filed for the same, was voted down, and a motion made to provide for the teaching of the language, as set forth in the defendant's answer, was not finally acted upon; followed by the averments that "said defendants have refused to provide for any teaching of the German language in any of the schools of said City during the coming school year."

The appellee insists that the reply shows that the appellant refused to comply in any manner with the mandate of the Statute to introduce the language as a study into the public schools; and that therefore the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the same.

To give the language quoted the force and effect claimed for it by the appellee would be to eliminate from the case the only question about which the parties litigant disagree; for the appellants admit that, upon the filing of a petition by the parents and guardians of the requisite number of children, the Statute imperatively requires the language to be taught in the schools.

The answer to which this reply was filed alleges that, in May, 1890, the Board determined to provide for the teaching of German in some of the grades and schools in the City; and that they would do so without any order of the court. The meeting of the Board, at which the motion was made to employ teachers and provide for the introduction of the language into the public schools, was held in June. This action was commenced in the same month and the reply filed on the 11th of July; the schools were not to begin until September following. There is no express negation of the facts alleged in the answer, that the Board intended to make provision for German in the schools before the opening of the school year.

We understand the allegations of the reply referred to, when read in connection with the answer, to mean that the Board had at that meeting refused to provide for its introduction; and not that they would not do so prior to the opening of the schools in September, in the manner determined upon at their May meeting. The purpose of the action was to compel the defendants to introduce the study in a particular school; all the allegations of the petition for a mandate referred to that school; the theory of the relator confined him to that position. The judgment of the court was in accordance with that theory, and by it the defendants were commanded to employ efficient teachers and introduce the language as a branch of study into that particular school, no order being made with reference to the other schools of the City.

This case is to be determined by the answer to the question: What did the General Assembly mean by the use of the words "any school" when it said, in the Act approved May 5, 1869: "And whenever the parents or guardians of twenty-five or more children in attendance at any school of a township, town or city shall so demand, it shall be the duty of the school trustee or trustees of said township, town or city to procure efficient teachers and introduce the German language as a branch of study into such schools."

The position of the appellee is, that the parents and guardians of more than twenty-five pupils in attendance upon public school No. 22, having at the proper time filed the requisite petition, it became the duty of the Board of School Commissioners to provide for its teaching in that particular school, no matter what arrangements may have been made to have it taught in other schools and to other scholars.

The position of the appellant is, that while the filing of the petition makes it incumbent upon the Board to have the language taught in the schools of the City, they may, in their discretion, determine in what schools, to what grades of pupils, and for what length of time it shall be taught; and that when they have provided for its teaching in some of the schools of the City, convenient of access to the grades in which the language is assigned, they have fully complied with the law, and cannot be compelled to have it taught in public school No. 22.

In arriving at a correct solution of the question involved, it is instructive to note, in a general way, the origin and growth of the legislation upon the subject under consideration. For many years prior and subsequent to the adoption of our present Constitution, the selection of teachers and designation of the studies to be taught in the public schools were under the exclusive control of school meetings, composed of the patrons of each school. The first legislative recognition of specific studies was in the Act of March 4, 1853, which provided that no person should be licensed to teach in the public schools unless they possessed "a knowledge of orthography, reading, writing, geography and English grammar."

is the rudiment of the section under which this action was brought, it was enacted that "the common schools shall be taught in the English language: provided, however, that schools may teach other languages in addition to the English as a branch of education."

In the Act of March 6, 1865, it was provided that "the common schools of the State shall be taught in the English language; and the trustee shall provide to have taught in them orthography, reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, English grammar and good behavior; and such other branches of learning and other languages as the advancement of the pupils may require and the trustee from time to time direct. And the tuition in said school shall be without charge."

This remained the law until the Act of May 5, 1869, supra, was enacted.

The first question is, omitting for the present all consideration of the effect of subsequent legislation, to determine if possible the legislative intent in the enactment of this Amendment of May 5, 1869, in which, after adding physiology and history of the United States to the required studies, the conditional provision was made for the teaching of the German language.

The Act of 1865, which was amended, required seven named branches of learning to be taught, and other studies and languages, at the option of the school trustees. It was, under that Act, within the power of the school trustees, if they so desired, to have physiology, history of the United States and the German language taught in the public schools. The object of the Amendment was to compel the teaching of physiology and history of the United States, and to withdraw the German language from the list of purely optional languages that might be taught at the discretion of the trustees, and place it conditionally in the list of required studies. By this legislation, the law-making power discriminated in an emphatic manner in favor of the teaching of the German over that of any other language. This Amendment was doubtless brought about by the fact that we had then, as now, a large population speaking the German language, who desired that their children should receive instruction in that language. Taking into consideration the course of legislation and the circumstances under which it was enacted, we are, if possible, to determine from the reading of the Act in what schools the Legislature intended the language should be taught.

The rule of construction to be adopted is provided by Statute, and is as follows:

Rev. Stat. 1881, § 240: "The construction of all statutes of this State shall be by the following rules, unless such construction be plainly repugnant to the intent of the Legislature or of the context of the same statute.

"First. Words and phrases shall be taken in their plain or ordinary and usual sense. But technical words and phrases, having a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law, shall be understood according to their technical import."

As the Act under consideration does not contain technical words or phrases, relating to the disputed question, having a peculiar meaning in law, we must take the words used in their "plain, ordinary and usual sense." In townships, towns and cities in which but a single school is taught, the solution of the question is easy; the trouble arises in towns and cities in which the schools are taught in many schoolhouses placed in different localities, the whole being under one management and control.

While the question may not be entirely free from doubt, we have arrived at the conclusion that the words "any school," as used in this Statute, mean and designate any place where a public school is taught, with its complement of teachers and scholars. Such we believe to be the ordinary and usual meaning of the word "school;" and that this construction is necessary to give effect to the object intended in its enactment. Such, indeed, seems from the reply to have been the construction placed upon the Act by the appellants and their predecessors in control of the city schools for many years prior to the year 1890. By the terms of this Act, the introduction of no other study into the public schools is made to depend upon the demand or request of the patrons of the school; but on the contrary, it has been the evident design of the Legislature to establish, as far as possible, a uniform course of study throughout the whole State.

We take it that the exception to the course of legislation was, primarily, for the benefit of parents and guardians who desired their children and wards to receive instruction in this language; and that a construction that would defeat this purpose ought not to be entertained if it can be avoided. We are of the opinion that the Legislature contemplated that the parents and guardians of the children in attendance upon a school who would demand the introduction of the German language would do so for the purpose of enabling their children and wards to engage in its study, and not for the purpose of enabling some other children and other wards of another grade and in attendance upon a school taught in some other schoolhouse to receive such instruction. In this case, the parents and guardians of 112 pupils in attendance upon public school No. 22 asked to have the German language taught in that school, with the undoubted motive of having their children and wards engage in its study. In answer to this request the appellants say, in effect: "We will not have this language taught in this school and to your children and wards attending it, but will introduce the study in some other school in some other part of the City, and to some other pupils." We regard this as a strained and unnatural construction of the words of the Act, utterly subversive of the purpose of its enactment. If the position of the appellants is the correct one, a petition by the parents and guardians of twenty-five pupils in attendance upon any one of the many public schools in the City of Indianapolis will cause the introduction of the German language into the schools of the City, as effectually and fully as if it had been petitioned for in each school by the requisite number of parents and guardians. We need not characterize a construction that leads to such a result.

Four years after the passage of this Act providing for the introduction of German into the public schools, when petitioned for, the Legislature passed the Act of March 3, 1871, which is in force only in the City of Indianapolis. By this Act, the control of the public schools, which prior to that time had devolved upon the school trustees, was transferred to the Board of School Commissioners. Among the other duties of their office, they were authorized: "First. To district the City for the purpose of electing school commissioners therein; and also to subdivide the City for general school purposes. Seventh. To establish and enforce regulations for the grading of, and course of instruction in the schools of the City, and for the government and discipline of such schools." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4460.

Section 8 of this Act (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4468) continues in force within the City all of the general school laws of the State which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act. Among the general provisions of the school laws thus continued in force is the following: "The persons listed in each of such towns and cities shall be considered as forming but single school districts therein, distinct from the townships in which they are situated."

It is earnestly contended by the appellants that, inasmuch as all the schools of a town or city form but a single school district, in which the school commissioners may assign the pupils to such school as they choose; and as they are given authority, in their discretion, to "establish and enforce regulations for the grading of and course of instruction in the schools of the City," they may determine in what schools and to what grades of the pupils the German language may be taught. We do not think that the Act of 1871 either repeals or modifies the sections of the Act of 1869 under consideration. In fact, we do not regard the provision authorizing the grading of the pupils as greatly enlarging the authority of the school officers in that respect. The power of the School Commissioners to establish and enforce regulations for grading the schools and regulating the course of study must be exercised subject to the dominant law of the State. The grant of a power which is a mere permission, not a command, to grade the schools or establish a course of study cannot be held to authorize the school commissioner to disregard a positive and specific law of the State.

While the City of Indianapolis does, for the purpose of the enumeration and listing of school children, and for many other purposes, constitute a single school district, it can hardly be said to have but one school. The mere statement of the proposition would seem to be sufficient. The Act of 1871 authorizes the School Commissioners to subdivide the City for general school purposes. The pleadings show that they have subdivided the City for school purposes and erected school buildings in different parts of the City, and assigned pupils to, and numbered them as, different schools. This makes them as effectually and distinctly different schools as those in a country township.

The appellants say in their answer that they have considered the subject of the study of German in connection with their resources; and that with their available resources they cannot provide for the teaching of German for any greater length of time than seven years out of the twelve-year course.

We are of the opinion that the allegations contained in the answer showing want of funds are fully met by the reply. The answer shows that the appellants had on hand, unappropriated, over $40,000 more than would be required for tuition upon the system of grading and plan of employment of teachers as adopted by the Board. The reply says that it will cost only $10,000 to provide for instruction in the German language wherever demanded. This is a complete reply to this portion of the answer. But the reply goes further and shows that in the estimated expense of running the schools, as set forth in the answer, there is included a sum in excess of $60,000 for teaching music, drawing, manual training, physical training, chemistry, physics, Greek, book-keeping, geometry, English literature, general history, algebra, Latin, training school for teachers, civil government, rhetoric and botany. None of these studies are named in the Statute as required studies; but their teaching is provided for under the general direction for the teaching of "such other branches of learning and other languages as the advancement of pupils may require and the trustee from time to time direct." Under this Statute, we hold that it is incumbent upon the school authorities to provide for the teaching of those studies that are expressly named and provided for, and that they cannot appropriate the school funds for the teaching of optional studies, and then say that they cannot comply with the requirements of the Statute for want of funds. We do not desire that this construction of this section of the Statute shall be understood as a curtailment of the enlarged discretion given the Board of School Commissioners in the control, grading and management of the public schools, except in so far as it may be necessary to give full force and effect to the legislative enactment.

The Board of School Commissioners is a quasi corporation possessing by necessary implication such powers as are, or may be, necessary to carry out the purpose for which it was created; but these powers must be exercised subject to the paramount laws of the State. With reference to the Act under consideration, we are of the opinion that when the requisite demand is made, it becomes the duty of the Board of School Commissioners to introduce the German language, as a study, into the particular school where it is demanded, and that, upon their refusal, they may be compelled by mandate to act in the matter; that they have no discretion to refuse, but must act. When they have introduced the study, they are, while acting in good faith and in the reasonable discharge of their official duties, the exclusive judges of the manner in which it is taught, and the extent to which it shall be studied; whether, for instance, by the teachers in charge of the school, or by some other efficient teacher who gives instruction in a number of schools. They are the judges who are to decide how much or how little instruction is given, provided it be taught simply as a branch of study. The Statute says, in a manner so positive and emphatic that it cannot be misunderstood, that the common schools of the State shall be taught in the English language, and any board of trustees or school commissioners or other school officers who, under guise of the provisions of this Act, should have a school taught in the German language would be guilty of misappropriating the school funds, and become liable therefor on his official bond.

We are met with the argument that by this construction, the German language, as a study, has an advantage over every other study, and that to do so is inexpedient and unjust. We did not enact this Statute, and it is no part of our duty to pass upon its expediency. That was for the Legislature. Our duty is to construe, not to criticise. We are not, however, apprehensive that the fears expressed in argument will be realized. We have no doubt but that the Board of School Commissioners, in its wisdom, will be able to devise means by which the law will be carried out in good faith, without serious interference with the grading of the schools.

We are, in this case, not called upon to decide, and do not decide, that the language shall be taught in each school-room, and it would be improper to express an opinion upon that subject. Neither can we judicially take notice that the German language may not, like good behavior, which is one of the required studies, or like music or physical training, which are optional ones, be taught in any grade without interference with other studies.

In our opinion, the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the reply.

Judgment affirmed.

McBride, J., dissenting:

In my opinion, a fair statement of the precise question involved and decided in this case is as follows:

The necessary preliminary steps having been taken, the German language was introduced as a branch of study into the schools of the City of Indianapolis. The Board of School Commissioners of the City (corresponding to the boards of school trustees of other cities and towns in the State) assuming that this branch of study was thereafter to be dealt with precisely as any one of the other nine required branches, graded the schools accordingly, and assigned it its place in the course of study, as they assigned a place to English grammar, to arithmetic and to other branches. By the course of study thus fixed, the study of the German language commenced with the beginning of the sixth year, and continued thereafter during the remaining seven years of the course.

None of the pupils in School No. 22 were advanced beyond the fifth year; and were consequently not sufficiently advanced to be assigned to the grades in which German was taught.

The answer, or return to the alternative writ of mandate, avers that the Board had taken under consideration the subject of teaching the German language, and had decided that "the last seven years of the course of instruction was the period in which the German language, as a branch of study, could be most efficiently taught, with the means under the control of said Board of School Commissioners; . . . that it is the intention, and has at all times been the intention of said Board of School Commissioners, to provide for the efficient teaching of the German language as a branch of study for all pupils attending the schools of said City, who have advanced in their studies to the beginning of the sixth year of the course of instruction, and to provide efficient teachers to that end; . . . that as soon as said pupils" (in school No. 22) "have advanced to the beginning of the sixth year in the course of instruction, as prescribed by the Board of School Commissioners, and thus entitled to be admitted to classes or grades wherein the German language is taught, they will be admitted into such grades in other buildings in which such grades and the German language are taught; which buildings have been provided convenient of access to such pupils."

These facts do not seem to be controverted. The appellee in this case, assuming that the Board had no discretion in the matter, as to that study, at least, but must provide for teaching it in that particular school, and to that particular grade regardless of the system of grading and course of study, and regardless of the age and acquirements of the pupils attending there, brought this suit to compel them to break up their system of grading and teach the German language to the particular pupils who were instructed in School No. 22. The contention of the appellee cannot be sustained without adjudging that, while the Legislature has assumed to intrust the management of the schools of the City to certain officers, elected by the people because of their assumed fitness, and acting under the sanction of an official oath, and has said in express terms that they are authorized "to establish and enforce regulations for the grading of, and course of instruction in the City," as to at least one study they have given to those officers no independent authority whatever; and although their deliberate judgment may be, that the best interests of the schools require the teaching of that study only to certain grades, and to pupils who have reached a certain degree of proficiency, they may be compelled by the strong arm of the courts to change the course of study at the demand of persons who are charged with no duty or responsibility; and who, while they may be as well or better informed and qualified to pass on such questions as the members of the Board, may, on the other hand, know as little of the management of schools as a babe does of logarithms.

With all due respect to my associates, this is a fair statement of the interpretation given to the law by the majority opinion herein, after giving due weight to every attempted limitation. Indeed, by every rule of logic, notwithstanding the attempt to limit the question decided, it goes much further; and, as I will hereafter show, undermines every vestige of authority to grade and to establish and maintain any systematic course of instruction in graded schools.

Counsel for appellee, in their brief, denounce the power which the Legislature has intrusted to school officers, to grade schools and regulate their course of study as: "the pretended bulwark behind which the pedagogic martinet exercises his petty tyranny, and school boards here and there carry a high and unlawful hand."

The decision of this case leaves but little if anything remaining of that "bulwark," although, under its shelter, the public schools of Indiana have reached a degree of efficiency second to the schools of no other State, and of which the people of the State are justly proud. It involves the determination of questions of the highest importance to the people of the State, not because it is of special importance to the people generally what is done in school No. 22, in the City of Indianapolis, but because its decision involves the determination of principles which cannot be confined in their application to school No. 22, nor alone to the schools of that City, but reach and affect every graded school in the State. If the effect of the opinion of the majority of the court could be limited to that particular school, or even to that City, I would hardly feel justified in dissenting. But in this country few questions concern more nearly the common interests of all the people than those affecting our common-school system, and anything, the tendency of which is to impair its efficiency or seriously imperil any of its essential features, demands earnest protest and opposition from all who are placed where they may be held responsible therefor.

The law gives to the school officers of every school corporation in the State authority to establish and maintain graded schools. The powers thus conferred upon school corporations outside of the City of Indianapolis do not differ in any material particular from those possessed by the school corporations of that City. At all events, it will not be claimed that less extensive powers are conferred upon that City than upon other cities and towns in the State.

The statute prescribing the studies which shall be taught is precisely the same as applied to all the public schools of the State. That which the Board of School Commissioners of Indianapolis may be compelled to do by mandate, by way of changing its course of study and system of grading, the board of school trustees of every city and town in the State may be compelled to do.

It may be well to consider, first, the nature of the power conferred upon school officers where they are authorized to establish and maintain graded schools.

What is a graded school? The Century Dictionary defines it: "A school divided into different departments, taught by different teachers, in which the children pass from the lower departments to the higher as they advance in education."

At page 225 of the Annual Report for 1877 of the United States Commissioner of Education, such a school is defined as "an arrangement of pupils according to their age and capacity to study certain things."

The establishment and maintenance of a graded school, therefore, involves not only the grading of the pupils according to age, capacity or acquirement, but the adoption of a course of study and of rules for the advancement of pupils from grade to grade as they advance in acquirement. The nature and extent of the power possessed by school officers to direct and control the course of study in the schools in their charge has been many times considered by this court and the courts of other States.

The case of State v. Webber, 108 Ind. 81, 6 West. Rep. 249, was a case involving the power of the school board to add music to the list of prescribed studies, and to suspend from the school those who refused to pursue that study. The court held that the making of a rule of that character was an exercise of the discretionary power possessed by the board, and denied mandamus to compel the re-admission of a pupil suspended for refusal to comply with it. In the course of the opinion, the court said: "It was competent, we think, for the trustees of the school City of Laporte to enact necessary and reasonable rules for the government of the pupils of its high school, directing what branches of learning such pupils should pursue, and regulating the time to be given to any particular study, and prescribing what book or books should be used therein. . . . The power to establish graded schools carries with it, of course, the power to establish and enforce such reasonable rules as may seem necessary to the trustees in their discretion, for the government and discipline of such schools, and prescribing the course of instruction therein. . . . Where such trustees may have established a system of graded schools, or such modification of them as may be practicable within their respective corporations, they are clothed by law with the discretionary power to prescribe the course of instruction in the different grades of their public schools. . . . The important question arises, Which should govern the public high school of the City of Laporte as to the branches of learning to be taught and the course of instruction therein, the school trustees of such city, to whom the law has confided the direction of these matters, or the mere arbitrary will of the relator without cause or reason in its support? We are of opinion that only one answer can or ought to be given to this question. The arbitrary wishes of the relator in the premises must yield, and be subordinated to the governing authorities of the school City of Laporte, and their reasonable rules and regulations for the government of the pupils of its high school."

Upon the question of the discretionary power possessed by the school officers in the management of the schools placed in their charge, the authorities overwhelmingly support the doctrine above laid down.

In Guernsey v. Pitkin, 82 Vt. 224, the following language is used by Redfield, Ch. J.: "But in regard to these branches which are required to be taught in the public schools, the prudential committee and the teachers must of necessity have some discretion as to the order of teaching them, the pupils who shall be allowed to pursue them, and the mode in which they shall be taught. If this were not so, it would be impossible to classify the pupils."

In Ferriter v. Tyler, 48 Vt. 444, the court says: "It stands out so plain as not to be matter for debate, even if it be not expressly conceded, that schools, in order to realize the intent of the Constitution in their behalf, must be subjected to system and order under established rules."

In Donahoe v. Richards, 88 Me. 879, it is said: "If the right to direct the course of instruction and the books to be used is given, the right to enforce obedience to the determining power must manifestly exist, or the determination will be ineffectual. It would be more than idle to grant this power to direct if anyone can set at naught the action of the committee."

In Roberts v. Boston, 5 Cush. 198, it is said: "The power of general superintendence vests a plenary authority in the committee to arrange, classify and distribute pupils, in such a manner as they think best adapted to their general proficiency and welfare."

In Hodgkins v. Rockport, 105 Mass. 475, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts says of a statute which says that school officers "shall have the general charge and superintendence of all the public schools in town," that "this general power by necessary implication includes the power to make all reasonable rules and regulations for the discipline, government and management of the schools."

To the same effect are the cases of Sevell v. Board of Education, 29 Ohio St. 89; Fertich v. Michener, 111 Ind. 472, 9 West. Rep. 894; King v. Jefferson City School Board, 71 Mo. 628, 86 Am. Rep. 499, and many other cases that might be cited.

The case of Trustees of Schools v. People, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55, is one of a line of cases opposing the principle laid down in State v. Webber, supra, in so far as affects the right of the parent to elect what studies in the prescribed course may, and what may not, be pursued by his child, it being there held that the parent may thus elect. To the same effect are Morrow v. Wood, 35 Wis. 59 (which is probably the leading case taking that view); Rutison v. Post, 79 Ill. 587, and some other cases. These cases, however, while holding that a pupil cannot be compelled to pursue a certain study against the will of the parent, expressly recognize and declare the right to classify and grade, and that there can be no interference by the parent with that right. While the parent may say that his child shall not be required to pursue certain studies, as to such studies as the child does pursue, he must conform to the established rules, and must take them in the order, in the classes and in the manner prescribed by the school officers.

In Trustees of Schools v. People, supra, it is said: "Under the power to prescribe necessary rules and regulations for the management and government of the schools, they may, undoubtedly, require classification of the pupils with respect to the branches of study they are respectively pursuing, and with respect to proficiency and degree of advancement in the same branches."

All regulations or rules to these ends are for the benefit of all, and presumptively promotive of the interests of all. No parent has the right to demand that the interests of the children of others shall be sacrificed for the interests of his child, and he cannot, consequently, insist that his child shall be placed or kept in particular classes, when by so doing others will be retarded in the advancement they would otherwise make; or that his child shall be taught studies not in the prescribed course of the school. The rights of each are to be enjoyed and exercised only with reference to the equal rights of all others."

And in Morrow v. Wood, supra, it is expressly stated that "the parent did not propose to interfere with the gradation or classification of the school, or with any of its rules and regulations, further than to assert his right to direct what studies his boy should pursue that winter;" that is, that he should be allowed to omit a certain study and thus stay out of certain of the established classes. If the opinion of the majority of the court in this case should stand as declaratory of the law, it will be unique, as being the first and only case under a statute which confers on school officers general power over and control of the public schools to declare the right of the parent instead of the school officer to control the gradation and classification of the pupils. It is against all the authorities, and, in principle expressly overrules State v. Webber, supra.

Power to establish and maintain graded schools has been possessed by the school officers of this State for more than thirty-five years; the Act of March 5, 1855 (1 Gav. & H. Stat. 542), containing this provision: Sec. 8. . . . They may also establish graded schools, or such modification of them as may be practicable."

The Act of March 6, 1865 (1 Davis, Stat. 778), contains the following: "Section 14: The trustees shall take charge of the educational affairs of their respective townships, towns and cities. . . . They may also establish graded schools, or such modification of them as may be practicable; and provide for admission into the higher departments of the graded school from the primary schools of their township such pupils as are sufficiently advanced for such admission."

The law which authorizes the establishment of graded schools by necessary implication carries with it the power to establish and enforce all necessary and reasonable regulations for grading such schools, and for establishing a course of instruction therein; to assign to each study its place in the course and to prescribe reasonable rules for the progression of pupils from grade to grade. In addition to this, the Act of March 3, 1871, confers express authority in the following terms: "To establish and enforce regulations for the grading of and course of instruction in the schools of the City, and for the government and discipline of such schools." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4460, cl. 7.

The Statute authorizing the introduction of the German language as a branch of study was enacted May 5, 1869. It declares in express terms that when introduced, it is "as a branch of study." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4497.

This was necessarily done in view of existing laws, authorizing the establishment of graded schools, with the attendant power to regulate the course of study, assigning to each branch of study its appropriate place. As a branch of study, it is like the other branches of study prescribed by the same Act, subject to similar regulation by the school officers. To hold otherwise would be to hold that by the Act of May 5, 1869, there was an implied repeal of the Statute giving power to grade to school officers in so far as this one branch of study is concerned. It is, of course, too well settled to require citation of authorities that repeals by implication are not favored, and that the two statutes must, if possible, be construed in pari materia so that full force and effect can be given to each. Again, by what rule of construction can it be said that when the Legislature two years later conferred power to establish regulations for the grading and course of instruction in the schools of the City, it intended to and did except one branch, and deny to the school board any control over it? Indeed, as I understand the position and argument of appellee's counsel, it is that the duty is imperative to provide for the teaching of all of the studies prescribed by the Statute in each grade. In this they are at least logical, and if they are right, the power to grade schools and establish a course of study is reduced to a very attenuated shadow, as each person whose children are attending a given school, who wishes them to be taught in any one of the required studies placed in grades in advance of that to which they belong, can compel a change in the course of study for his accommodation. The separate and individual opinion or caprice of the parents will be substituted for the judgment of the officer, while the order and system of the school-room will give place to anarchy.

The attempt to limit the application of the principle declared to the one study is ineffectual. It is made to turn on a question of verbal criticism, by which process the conclusion is reached, that by the words "any school" as used in section 4497, supra, is meant the particular building or room, with its complement of teachers, pupils, etc., which chances at the time to be occupied by the pupils whose parents have presented the petition, whether the building contains those belonging to only one out of many grades, or, like the ordinary district school, contains those of all grades in one room.

The further conclusion is also reached, that school No. 22, although shown to contain only certain pupils belonging to certain of the lower grades in the city school system, is a separate and distinct school within the meaning of the law. This process of examination of the Statute is entirely too microscopic to afford a solution to the problem. The Legislature, in the enactment of this law, was prescribing a general rule, intended to govern all the schools of the State. In perhaps the majority of the towns of the State one large building, containing many rooms, accommodates all the grades; the pupils starting in the primary room and passing in time from room to room, as they pass from grade to grade. Suppose, while we find this condition existing in a given town, that in a neighboring town we find, instead of one large building, many small ones, each separate from the others; each with its complement of teachers and pupils, and each accommodating a single grade. With promotion, its pupils pass from building to building, as they pass from grade to grade. By the rule of construction thus adopted one town has a single school and the other has many schools. In the town with the single large building, the parents of twenty-five children attending that school can, upon petition, have the German language introduced as a branch of study, while in the other, although the parents of many times that number petition for it, unless at least twenty-five of them are in one of the buildings they cannot have it. If the requisite number of children are found only in one of the buildings, they can have the study introduced into that building and grade, and in none of the others. Did the Legislature intend any such thing? It was evidently the intention that a much broader view should be taken. The child, when it enters a graded school, does not enter it with a view to completing its education in a single grade; but expecting that, as intellect develops and additional acquirement comes, it shall pass from grade to grade, from room to room or, if you please, from school to school. It is, of course, unfortunate that many pupils are unable to complete the course, and in that way are deprived of the instruction which can only be given to them in the later years of the course. For this, no remedy can be devised. It is true of all studies which in the course prescribed lie beyond the point where they drop out. Under any system of grading which will give time for efficient instruction, some studies must wait while others are being taken. To require children of primary grades to pursue simultaneously all of the required studies would be to impose on their untrained intellects an unreasonable and unjustifiable tax. It is upon this that all systems of grading are based, with a view to the gradual development and unfolding of the child's mental powers. There can be no forcing of this development. The task of devising the best means of accomplishing this end the law has entrusted to the school board. It was undoubtedly the legislative purpose, in authorizing the introduction of this branch of study, to give opportunity to acquire a practical knowledge of it. How could this be accomplished if, when it was petitioned for by the requisite number of persons, it was not thereupon to be placed in the course with other studies and provision made for continued and progressive instruction in it? In this case is it expected that the pupils in school No. 22 will acquire a practical knowledge of that study in the brief time they will remain in that grade?

It is manifest that in that short time they could at best acquire but a slight and superficial knowledge of the rudiments of the language, which could be of no practical value whatever. We cannot think that this is what the Legislature had in view.

In the course of instruction prescribed by the appellant seven years are devoted to that study. That is, the course of instruction in that study extends over that time. When the parents of school No. 22 asked to have it introduced in that room did they expect that when, in a few months promotion carried their children to other grades, instruction in that language would end? When the Legislature provided for the admission of that study into schools on petition, it certainly meant that it should come in as a branch of study not in a given grade, but in the school, viewing the school as an entirety from the time the pupil entered it until he left. It certainly meant to leave the question as to when and where it could be most efficiently taught to the officers entrusted with the management of the schools, as they entrusted to them similar discretion with reference to all other studies. And when these officers show the adoption of a plan, providing for the thorough teaching of this study to all the school children as soon as they reach a certain grade, and that to this end they have provided buildings convenient of access to all, is it just or fair to characterize this as a proposition to teach the study only to some other children in some other part of the City?

Much false reasoning in this case comes from considering it as a question of adding a particular study to the course instead of adding an additional study. Suppose this statute, instead of providing for the introduction of the German language, provided for the introduction in precisely the same manner of some of the higher branches of mathematics; strike out the words "German language," and insert instead, algebra, or trigonometry or geometry, would anyone seriously insist that the Legislature meant that when a petition was presented by the requisite number of persons for its introduction as a branch of study, the Board would not only be required to admit it, but might, on demand, be compelled to provide for teaching it to the primary grades? Suppose the last Legislature had amended the law by additional proviso in precisely the same words, except that it had called for the introduction of the Hebrew language; a large, intelligent and useful class of our citizens would have special interest in such a law. Indeed, the great mass of our people, believing that the Hebrew Scripture is the Word of God, would have special interest in such a law. If the reasoning in the opinion of the majority of the court is sound, the Board of School Commissioners would not only be compelled to admit it as a branch of study, but would be powerless to determine where in the course of study it should be taught, and might on demand be compelled to provide for teaching it in the primary grades. All the reasoning as applied to the German language would apply with equal force to the Hebrew language, or to the Italian or French, or the language of Sweden.

I do not question the power of the Legislature to limit the control of school officers in the management of schools. It has created these officers and conferred such powers as they have. Notwithstanding the fact that time has demonstrated the wisdom of their course, and that the large measure of discretion vested in those officers has been a potent factor in the magnificent development of our school system, the power which created can destroy them, or may in any manner curtail their power. It is not here a question of legislative policy, but of the construction of a legislative Act. Although, indeed, if one interpretation given to this Act by counsel for appellee in argument could be correct, there might be a question of legislative power. I refer to the construction which would view this law as enacted for the benefit of Germans. As a branch of study, there can be no objection to the introduction of the German language into our schools. It is a noble language, of a great people. It is not only commercially advantageous to our children to be able to use it, but it introduces them to a literature singularly rich and strong. But neither Germans, French, English, nor those of any other foreign nationality can, as such, have any rights in our public schools; and any legislation attempting to recognize or confer any such right would be void.

Our Constitution, providing for a system of common schools, contemplates a school system for the education of the children of American citizens only, and such an education as will fit them for the duties of American citizenship. That which has made the German emigrant so welcome an addition to our population is the readiness with which he becomes Americanized, and the sincerity of their devotion to their adopted country has been sealed in blood on many battle fields. As American citizens, their rights in our common schools are the same as if they were native born. But the doors of the common school can only legally open to those of foreign blood when they renounce their alien allegiance and pledge fidelity to the United States. I cannot think that the Legislature intended by this action to introduce the race question into our schools, or to recognize the principle that any other key than that of American citizenship should, under any pretense, open the schoolhouse door. Sound public policy demands the emphatic declaration that in this country and under our flag there is room for but one nationality,—where all have common interests and should have one common language.

In my opinion, the German language is, by virtue of the petition presented and the demand made, one of the required studies in the City of Indianapolis; but that, as such, it stands upon precisely the same footing as all the other required studies, and should be given its proper place and fair proportion of the time in the course of instruction; that while the Board of School Commissioners could be compelled by mandate to admit it to the course, if they refused, their discretion could not, and cannot be further controlled.

Mandate will not lie to control or direct the exercise of a discretionary power by a public officer. State v. Demaree, 80 Ind. 519; Madison v. Smith, 88 Ind. 502; Jelley v. Roberts, 50 Ind. 1; Burnet v. Wabash & E. Canal, 50 Ind. 251; Mitchell v. Wiles, 59 Ind. 864; Fort Wayne v. Cody, 48 Ind. 197; Brinkmeyer v. Evansville, 29 Ind. 167; Michigan City v. Roberts, 84 Ind. 471.

Mandate will lie to compel an officer to act, but not to control the manner of his acting except to discharge a duty specifically enjoined by law. See cases above cited, and also State v. Demaree, 80 Ind. 519; Indianapolis v. Patterson, 88 Ind. 157.

This is the rule as applied to school officers equally with other public officers. State v. Andrews, 108 Ind. 81, 6 West. Rep. 249; Fertich v. Michener, 111 Ind. 472, 9 West. Rep. 894; Braden v. McNutt, 114 Ind. 214, 18 West. Rep. 798.

If the discretion of the School Board can be controlled in the matter of this particular study, it can be as to all of the prescribed studies; and there is necessarily subordination of the power of the School Board in grading, to the will of each individual parent who has a child in attendance in the school. This practically destroys it.

The difference between the views entertained by the majority of the court and my opinion, briefly stated, is this: As they construe the law, a petition and demand will only require the admission of the study of the German language to the particular building in which the petitioners' children are at the time instructed, and to no other part of the school; and the Board of School Commissioners are powerless to say where that shall be; while, as I construe the law, when the petition is presented and the demand is properly made, that language must be placed in the course with the other required studies for the equal benefit of all, and that the school officers have the same power to assign it its place in the course that they have over any other study.

For the foregoing reasons, I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court. Olds, J., concurs in this opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Inhabitants of EASTHAMPTON

v.
HAMPSHIRE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

(....Mass....)

Express authority is not absolutely necessary to justify the taking of a strip of land from a schoolhouse lot for a townway.

(September 24, 1891.)

PRESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Hampshire County (Knowlton, J.) for the opinion of the full court of a petition for a writ of certiorari to quash proceedings of the County Commissioners in laying out a townway. Petition dismissed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. David Hill for petitioners.

Mr. W. G. Bassett for respondents.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The short question before us is whether county commissioners can take a strip of land from a schoolhouse lot for a townway. Taking the strip will injure the lot considerably for school purposes, but will not prevent its use, so far as appears. We must assume that the way is necessary, and, if it be material, we must assume that taking this strip is reasonably necessary for the way, whoever may be the final judge on the latter question when it is raised.

The case thus presented lies in the doubtful region between two extremes which are free from doubt. Ordinarily a highway or railroad could not be laid out longitudinally over a previously established railroad or highway by virtue of general statutory powers or without special authority from the Legislature. West Boston Bridge v. Middlesex County Comrs. 10 Pick. 270, 272; Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 63, 71; Boston & M. R. Co. v. Lowell & L. R. Co. 124 Mass. 368, 371. On the other hand, in the absence of special regulations and by virtue of a general authority to lay out such roads, necessary crossings could be made. When we come to more difficult cases we draw little aid from the varying statements of general principles under which authority will be implied to take land for a second public use. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Boston, 140 Mass. 87, 89, 1 New Eng. Rep. 94; Providence & W. R. Co. v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 138 Mass. 277, 279; Boston & M. R. Co. v. Lowell & L. R. Co. 124 Mass. 368, 370; Wellington Petitioner, 16 Pick. 86, 105.

We must consider the relative importance and the necessities of the two uses generically, the extent of the harm to be done, accept any light that history may throw, and make up our minds under all the circumstances of the particular case as best we can. To put cases nearer to the present and lying between the two extremes which we have mentioned, it would be a strong thing to say that without special circumstances county commissioners or other like officers acting under general powers could lay out a highway through a public reservoir so as to ruin it. See State v. Montclair R. Co. 35 N. J. L. 328; and as further examples on this side, Re Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 574; Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Williamson, 91 N. Y. 552. On the other hand, if a tract of land were held for public purposes, which was so broad that it was impracticable to go around it and which could be crossed without serious harm by the edge of a stream that flowed through it, it well might be held lawful for the way to cross it. See Wood v. Macon & B. R. Co. 68 Ga. 539.

The proviso of our Act of 1834, chap. 187, § 1, the original of Pub. Stat., chap. 82, §§ 29, 30, implies very clearly that any "railroad or other public easement already located" through a graveyard was located lawfully. The law seems to be different in Connecticut. Evergreen Cemetery Assn. v. New Haven, 43 Conn. 234. When it is considered that very large tracts of land often are appropriated to school purposes (see Statute October 3, 1782, 1 Mass. Spec. Laws, 33, 34; March 23, 1784, 1 Spec. Laws, 72; March 11, 1791, 1 Spec. Laws, 303; November 17, 1792, 1 Spec. Laws, 399; March 3, 1801, 2 Spec. Laws, 423), it is impossible to accept an unqualified rule that no part of such land can be taken for a way under any circumstances without an express enactment. In the only case which we have found precisely parallel to this it was held that the strip was lawfully taken from the school lot. Rominger v. Simmons, 88 Ind. 453. See also Indiana Cent. R. Co. v. State, 3 Ind. 421, 425.

The converse case of an attempt to place a schoolhouse within the limits of a highway is by no means so strong. Apart from any comparison of the two public uses, usually there can be no necessity for the selection of such a place, since there is a much greater freedom of choice as to where a schoolhouse shall be put than where roads shall run. But to show the views which have prevailed in Massachusetts we quote the following:

"November 9, 1702. The motion presented in writing by Nathl. Byfield and Ebenezer Brenton, Esqrs., for a resolution of this question, viz.: whether the setting up a court-house or schoolhouse in the street of any town within this Province where the street is so wide as to leave not less than twenty-five feet clear for passage on each side of sd. edifice, be not allowable within the true meaning and intent of the Act entitled 'An Act to Prevent Incroachments upon Highways, Streets, etc.' and of the proviso in the said Act,—was returned from the representatives with the concurrence of that House to the Resolve past thereon by the board on the 4th curr. to wit,—

"Resolved, that the above building, being a public use, and within the reason of the proviso in the said Act, and that the erecting of the same shall be accounted by this court no breach of the said Act which resolve is consented to J. Dudley. From Records of the governor and council, VII., 291, in 1 Prov. Laws, 863."

The Act in question was the Act of 1698, chap. 2. Very plainly schoolhouses were not saved by the proviso, but they were read in by the foregoing resolve. If the present case had been presented we think the answer would have been more unhesitating still.

Petition dismissed.

BAKER LODGE, No. 47, A. F. & A. M.,
Appt.

(....Or....)

*1. Grants of rooms or apartments in a building, like leases of the same, must be construed according to the intention of the parties, and with reference to the subject matter upon which they operate.

2. Where the language of the grant does not purport to convey an estate or interest in the land or building, or any portion of it, but only a certain room located in such building, namely, "the middle room or hall of the upper story," carefully distinguishing by its provisions the room granted from other rooms, and contains no stipulation as to rebuilding in case of fire or other casualty, and such building is destroyed by fire, and the identity and existence of the room as such were extinguished, there was nothing remaining upon which the conveyance could operate, and the rights of the defendant terminated.

3. If an easement for a particular purpose is granted, when the purpose no longer exists there is an end of the easement.

*Head notes by LORD, J.

NOTE.—Conveyance, sale of part of building conveys a mere easement.

When a building is so constructed that one part of it is made tributary to the other, on a sale of that part of it which is tributary the natural presumption will be, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, that the purchaser takes the part he buys subject to such use by the other part as the mechanical arrangement of the building imposes. *Mayo v. Lord, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought by the plaintiff to restrain the defendant from interfering with certain alleged rights in certain premises claimed by the plaintiff. The facts out of which the question presented for our consideration arose are substantially these: The plaintiff was the owner of a certain lot in Baker City, upon which was erected a two-story building, the middle room or hall in the upper story of which was owned by the defendant, and used as a lodge hall, and, as appurtenant thereto, it owned an easement as a means of ingress and egress. The room owned by the defendant, being a middle room, had front and rear walls and two lateral walls. A fire occurring, the whole building was substantially destroyed. The roof, floors, joists, windows and doors were totally consumed by the flames; and at the same time the rear and front walls were entirely destroyed to their foundation, and only a portion of the lateral walls remained, which were fire-cracked, shaky, and unfit for use. So far as relates to the second story, only a portion of the lateral walls were left above the second story, and as they stood they were unsafe, and practically useless for rebuilding purposes. The other walls were destroyed, so that the middle room in the second story, used as a hall by the defendants, and its foundations, were practically destroyed by the conflagration, and its identity lost or extinguished. While there is some conflict in the evidence, there is none upon which to base the contention that there was any sufficient portion of the lateral walls remaining to preserve the identity of the middle room, or that such portions as remained were sufficiently safe for rebuilding purposes as they stood. The practical deduction from the evidence, considered as a whole, leaves no doubt that the middle room in the upper story, owned by the defendant, was wholly destroyed, and that the building itself was substantially destroyed. Upon this state of facts, the inquiry is, Had the defendant the right which it undertook to exercise, and which this suit is brought to enjoin, of rebuilding the walls for the purpose of reconstructing an upper story, and recreating a middle room, to be used as a lodge hall in the place of the one destroyed by the fire? By its conveyance the defendant had granted to it what was known and styled as the middle room of the upper story of the building, and an easement of ingress and egress. There is no provision in it, or right given to the defendant, in case of the destruction of the upper story by fire, or of the building, itself to rebuild it. It does not, in terms, grant or convey the land, and does not purport to grant or convey the building, but only the middle room or hall in the upper story, and without any stipulation as to rebuilding in case of fire. It seems to us that conveyances of this kind, like leases of apartments in buildings, must be construed according to the intention of the parties, and with reference to the subject matter upon which they operate. As applied to a lease, the doctrine of the law is, when it is not the intention to grant any interest in the land further than is necessary for the enjoyment of the room leased, that when such room is destroyed there is nothing upon which the demise can operate, and that the lease terminates with the destruction of the thing leased. Harrington v. Watson, 11 Or. 148. The application of this doctrine is well illustrated in the case of Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 448, in which this question was carefully considered. In that case the lessor of a three-story building leased the cellar or basement to a tenant for five years, and the other stories to other tenants; but the lease contained no stipulation as to rebuild-be recovered. Thorne v. Wilson, 9 West. Rep. 45, 110 Ind. 385; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 25.

The right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit or lawful use out of or over the estate of another proprietor, is merely an easement. Ritger v. Parker, 8 Cush. 145.

So the grant of a right to have and to hold a second story to a building for the use of a lodge is an easement. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 25.

No estate can be created of mere space of air above ground; and though property in a room may be conveyed (Brooke, Abr. Demand, 20; Year Book 5 Hen. VIII., p. 9); yet, if the foundation fail, the property goes; it ceases with the thing itself. Jackson v. Buel, 9 Johns. 298; Jackson v. May, 16 Johns. 184.

So if a church is burned, the right to a pew therein is gone. Freligh v. Platt, 5 Cow. 494.

A distinction is made between the lease of a house and the lease of an apartment therein. In the former case the lease carries with it the land whereon the house stands; in the latter case it does not. Thus, where a cellar was leased, and the building was destroyed by fire, it was held that the lessee had no right to roof in the space he had formerly occupied. Winton v. Cornish, 5 Ohio, 477.

The interest of the occupier of a room in a building is peculiar; he has simply the right of occupation, and a destruction of the building ends that right. Kerr v. Merchants Exch. Co. 8 Edw. Ch. 215, 6 L. ed. 672; Graves v. Berdan, 29 Barb. 100; Smith v. St. Philips Church, 10 Cent. Rep. 473, 107 N. Y. 610; Tenant v. Goldwin, 1 Salk. 360.

A destruction of the house in the absence of covenants to repair terminates the tenancy. Ainsworth v. Ritt, 28 Cal. 90; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 50 Ala. 534; McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356; Rowan v. Kelsey, 18 Barb. 490.

If the building is destroyed, no right of possession in any part of the lot remains in any of the former occupants. Pearce v. Colden, 8 Barb. 527.

At the expiration of a lease of land, an action of ejectment for the lot alone, by metes and bounds, lies against parties occupying separately the different stories of the building, as joint trespassers on the land, in using it to uphold the building, and plaintiff is not bound to elect against which one he will proceed. Pearce v. Ferris, 10 N. Y. 285.

Extinguishment of easement.

An easement is one of the rights of property which may be extinguished or destroyed. See Hancock v. Wentworth, 5 Met. 448; 1 Rolle, Abr. 984; 2 Fournel, Traité de Voisinage, 405; 3 Toullier, Droit Civil, 522; Washb. Easem. 701.

ing in case of fire, and it was held that the destruction of the building terminated the lessee's rights in the premises. It was put upon the ground that such lease of distinct rooms or apartments do not carry any interest in the land beyond that connected with the enjoyment of the particular room; that the room was the thing leased; and that the destruction of the thing leased necessarily terminated the lessee's interest therein. The real question in all such cases, as it must be in the case at bar, is whether the intention of the parties, collected from the whole instrument, was to grant any estate in the land. The language in the conveyance precludes the idea that it was the intention to grant the building, or any portion of it, but only a certain room located in that building ("the middle room or hall of the upper story"), which is the principal thing granted, and which is identified by description to distinguish it from other rooms.

As the conveyance does not purport, in terms, to grant any estate or interest in the land, and as the provisions of the conveyance carefully distinguish the room granted from other rooms of the building, and as it contains no stipulation to rebuild in case of fire or other casualty, there is nothing to be taken by implication to justify us in holding that any grant of an estate in the land was intended. It is not doubted that there may be a freehold interest in a part of a building. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 18. Nor do we wish to be understood as holding that the sale of an interest in a building may not be a sale of an estate or interest in the subjacent soil. What we are trying to indicate is that, by the terms of the interest, it is the middle room or hall of the upper story which was granted to the defendant, and not a part of the building; that the defendant did not acquire any right of ownership in the building, or any part of it, but in the room or space inclosed by that part of the building which was described and identified as the middle room or hall of the upper story. This it owned; and so long as it existed, and its identity was preserved, the defendant had the right to its enjoyment. But when the fire destroyed the building, and the identity of the room and its existence as such were extinguished and at an end, there was nothing remaining upon which the defendant's conveyance could operate, and its rights at once terminated. In Thorne v. Wilson, 110 Ind.

825, 9 West. Rep. 45, where a committee on behalf of the order of freemasons had granted the right to construct a second story upon a building erected by the owner of the land, "to have and own said second story for their use perpetually," it was held that they did not acquire any proprietary interest in the freehold of which such second story became a part. In construing the instrument, the court says: "It is evident that the instrument relied on by the appellant does not convey an interest in the land;" and then adds: "For it is quite clear that, if the buildings should be totally destroyed, the rights of the appellants, and of their grantors as well, would at once terminate." As the instrument grants the defendant no estate in the land, and contains no stipulation of the right to rebuild in case of destruction by fire or other casualty, it would seem to be plain that it was the intention of the parties, collected from their agreement and its subject matter, that the agreement, and the relation created by it, should terminate with the destruction of the building.

The remaining question is whether the easement for the purpose of ingress and egress was extinguished by the destruction of the building. The facts show that such easement was granted for the particular purpose of affording ingress and egress to the building. Without it the principal thing (the room granted) would be practically useless. It was essential and necessary for the enjoyment of the room, and was granted on account of it. Nor is it of any use, within the purposes of the grant, without the existence of the room. In such case, the general rule, as stated by Mr. Washburn, is that, "if an easement for a particular purpose is granted, when that purpose no longer exists there is an end of the easement." Washb. Easem. pp. 654, 657. When the reason and necessity for the easement ceased, within the intent for which it was granted, as it did when the building was destroyed by fire, it would logically result there was an end of the easement.

For these reasons we think there was no error upon the legal questions presented by this record, but that the damages awarded are not justified by the facts under the circumstances, and that the decree awarding them must be disallowed, but in all other things affirmed, and so it is ordered.

Mr. T. M. Maltbie, for appellee:

It is the undoubted right of a father or guardian to fix the residence of a minor at some place other than his own residence or domicile.

A guardian has the same power over his ward that a parent has over his child. He has the custody of his person, and may appoint the place of his residence.

Holyoke v. Haskins, 5 Pick. 26. See also Kirkland v. Whately, 4 Allen, 462.

Residence for school purposes differs entirely from that fixed and permanent residence necessary to gain a settlement.

Milton School Dist. No. 1 v. Bragdon, 28 N. H. 507; Brentwood School Dist. No. 2 v. Polard, 55 N. H. 508; State v. Thayer, 74 Wis. 48.

NOTE.—Common-school privileges are regulated by statute.

The right to be educated in the common schools of the State is one derived entirely from legislation, and as such is subject to such limitations as the Legislature may, from time to time, see fit to make. It is not a constitutional right. Dallas v. Foadick, 40 How. Pr. 249.

An inhabitant cannot claim for his children the absolute right to select such a school for them as he pleases, in disregard of the regulations of the board of public instruction. People v. Easton, 13 Abb. Pr. 159.

The board of public instruction have the power, in their discretion, to adopt regulations for the admission of pupils, by which the assignment of children between schools affording equal advantages shall be determined; but if they should unlawfully exclude a child from a school, the remedy would be by action. Ibid.

Domicil, how determined.

The domicile is the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there, while simple residence is much more temporary in its character. New York v. Genet, 4 Hun, 487.

A minor may have, for school purpose, a residence other than that of his parents. State v. Thayer, 74 Wis. 48.

Domicil is but the established, fixed, permanent

In determining questions of residence and domicile and changes therein, the intention of the parties concerned is the all-important consideration.

Clinton v. Westbrook, 38 Conn. 12.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is, and has been since May, 1887, a domiciled resident and taxpayer in the defendant School District. Ada Austin, a child of thirteen years, has been during all that time living with him as a member of his family. She attended school in said District. The defendant presented to the plaintiff a bill for her tuition, and threatened to exclude her from attending the school unless such bill was paid. The plaintiff thereupon preferred the present complaint to the superior court, praying that the District be enjoined from interfering in any manner with the attendance of the said Ada Austin at the school. The superior court granted the injunction, and the defendant has appealed to this court.

The defendant insists that it has the right to require tuition to be paid for the schooling of the said Ada, for the reason that she did not so reside in or belong to the School District that she could be enumerated as a person within school age residing therein. This claim implies—what was directly admitted by the counsel for the defendant—that if she might lawfully be enumerated in the District then she was entitled to attend school there without paying tuition. The said Ada is a niece of the plaintiff's wife. She was born in the State of Illinois, where her parents then resided. Her parents now reside in Missouri, and have never resided in this State. The plaintiff and his wife have no or ordinary dwelling-place or place of residence of a person, as distinguished from his temporary and transient, though actual, place of residence. It is his legal residence, as distinguished from his temporary place of abode; or his home, as distinguished from a place to which business or pleasure may temporarily call him. Salem v. Lyme, 29 Conn. 74; Black, Law Dict. title, Domicil.

Every person must have a domicile somewhere; and he can only have one domicile at one and the same time. Every person has a domicile of origin, which he retains until he acquires another; and the one thus acquired is in like manner retained until he acquires a third domicile. The existing domicile always continues until another is acquired. So by the acquisition of another, the former domicile is relinquished. Abington v. North Bridgewater, 53 Pick. 170; Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Met. 242; Kilburn v. Bennett, 3 Met. 199.

The domicile of origin arises from birth or connections. The domicile of a minor follows that of his father, and remains until he acquires another, which he cannot do until he becomes an adult. Andrews v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 518, note 2.

A domicile is defined to be the place where a person has fixed his habitation, without any present intention of removing therefrom. Putnam v. Johnson, 10 Mass. 488; 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. 480.

It is defined by Webster to be a place of permanent residence either of an individual or a family.

children. In 1882 the child, then being six years old, came to live with the plaintiff, who then resided in Winchester in this State, upon an arrangement between the plaintiff and his wife on the one hand and the parents of the child on the other, that she should live with the plaintiff and his wife so long as they should live, unless she should sooner by marriage or otherwise make a home for herself. Pursuant to that arrangement she has ever since resided with the plaintiff, and he has had the entire actual control over her, caring for her in all respects as though she was his own child. In May, 1887, the plaintiff removed from Winchester to Hartford, purchased a lot within the school district, built a house thereon, and has since that time resided there with his family, which consists only of himself, his wife, and the said Ada; and he has no intention of changing such residence. It is the expectation and the intent of the said Ada, and of her parents, and of the plaintiff and his wife, that she shall continue to live with the plaintiff and his wife as their own child so long as they shall live. The plaintiff and his wife have never formally adopted her according to the Statute regulating the adoption of children.

It is the claim of the defendant that no child can be properly enumerated in any school district as belonging thereto, so as to be entitled to instruction in its schools without tuition, unless such child has a legal residence in the sense of domicile therein, or is an apprentice to a master residing there, or is a pauper and so a ward of the public. It is not pretended that the child Ada is an apprentice and she certainly is not a pauper.

It is quite possible that the facts in this case do not show that the minor child in question had a domicile in the defendant District in the technical meaning of that term. Domicile in that sense is the actual or constructive presence of a person in a given place, coupled with the intention to remain there permanently; and as a minor cannot exercise an independent intent in this matter, a minor can have no domicile other than that of the parent or guardian. But the facts do show that she had a residence there in the ordinary and popular meaning of the word. She is and has been for some time actually there. Her own intent is to remain there permanently. The intent of her parents and of Mr. and Mrs. Yale is that she shall remain there permanently; so that the will of all the persons who have any authority to control the intent of this minor concurs with her own in this respect. All the elements necessary to constitute residence are present. The house of the plaintiff is her home. She did not come into the District for the purpose of obtaining instruction in its schools. She came there because her home was with the plaintiff and he removed to Hartford from Winchester; and because her home is with the plaintiff she expects to remain in Hartford permanently. We think this is residence sufficient for school purposes, and that Ada Austin belongs to the West Middle School District and ought to be enumerated there.

A construction so narrow and technical as is claimed by the defendant would seriously impair the usefulness of the School Laws and would defeat various provisions of the Statute. The State is interested to have all the children educated in order that they may become good citizens. Experience has demonstrated that it costs the public much more to support one ignorant or vicious person than to educate many children. On the simple ground of economy the State cannot afford to permit any child to grow up without being sent to school. The School Laws recognize this fact and their provisions are framed accordingly. If any child is actually dwelling in any school district, so that some person there has the care of it, and is within the school age, not incapable by reason of physical infirmity of attending school, and is not instructed elsewhere, then that child must go to the public school. Section 18 of the General Statutes provides that "public Domicile is defined to be "a residence at a particular place, accompanied with positive or presumptive proof of continuing it an unlimited time." A person being at a place is prima facie evidence that he is domiciled there; but it may be explained and the presumption rebutted. Re Wrigley, 8 Wend. 142; 2 Kent, Com. 431, note c; *Marsh v. If a party removes from his domicile, with an intention of returning, he does not lose his domicile; as he can have acquired one nowhere else. 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. 490.

So if a person leaves the place of his domicile temporarily, or for a particular purpose, and does not take up a permanent residence elsewhere, he does not change his domicile. Granby v. Amherst, 18 L. R. A.

To constitute domicile there must be actual residence and personal presence in a place, and an intention of making it the home of the party. Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Met. 245; Sears v. Boston, 1 Met. 251; Wayne v. Greene, 21 Me. 357; Leach v. Pillsbury, 15 N. H. 137; State v. Daniels, 44 N. H. 383; Boardman v. House, 18 Wend. 512; Hegeman v. Hall, 4 Humph. 346; McIntyre v. Chappell, 4 Tex. 187.

But residence and domicile are not interchangeable terms, as a man may reside in one place and have his domicile in another. North Yarmouth v. West Gardiner, 58 Me. 207; Hampden v. Levant, 50 Me. 557; Alston v. Newcomer, 42 Miss. 186; Briggs v. Rochester, 16 Gray, 337; Bell v. Pierce, 61 N. Y. 12; Tazewell County Suprs. v. Davenport, 40 Ill. 197; *Hallett v. schools shall be maintained, . . . and such schools shall be open to all children over four years of age in the respective districts, without discrimination on account of race or color." Section 2102 that "all parents and those who have the care of children, shall . . . cause such child to attend a public day school regularly during the hours and terms while the public schools in the district wherein such child resides are in session, or elsewhere to receive thorough instruction during said hours and terms in the studies taught in said public schools." And section 2103, that "each week's failure on the part of any person to comply with the provisions of the preceding section shall be a distinct offense punishable with a fine not exceeding five dollars." In other sections particular provisions are made that the conduct of parents, or others having the care of children, shall be inspected, so that all children shall attend school; that children whose parents do not send them to school may be removed from the care of their parents; and that truant children shall be arrested and sent to school, and that habitual truants may be sentenced to any house of reformation or to the reform school. All through these sections the expression "those having the care of children," is used as exactly equivalent to parents or guardian. And nowhere is it indicated that the duty to send children to school, or the duty of the district to furnish instruction, depends on anything other than the residence of the child. All distinction between domicil and actual residence seems to be carefully excluded.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State OF MICHIGAN

v.

John JOHNSON, Appt.

(....Mich....)

1. Being intoxicated and yelling on the public streets of a village in such a manner as to disturb the good order and tranquillity is a breach of the peace.

2. An officer has no authority to make an arrest without a warrant, for a breach of the peace committed when he was out of sight on another street 150 feet away, although the disturbance was heard by him.

3. A conviction for resisting an officer in arresting the defendant for breach of the peace without a warrant cannot be sustained on appeal by the claim that defendant was liable to arrest for being intoxicated in a public street.

NOTE—"Breach of the peace" defined.

In Desty's American Criminal Law, § 91, the rule is laid down that every person who, without authority of law, disturbs the peace and security of the public, or who commits any act which tends to provoke or excite others to a breach of the peace, is guilty of a misdemeanor; and all acts tending to disturb the public peace are indictable at the common law. It is not necessary that the peace be actually broken to lay the foundation to such a proceeding. If what is done is unjustifiable and unlawful, tending with sufficient directness to break the peace, no more is required. Way v. Loveridge, 75 Mich. 488.

A breach of the peace is "a violation of public order—the offense of disturbing the public peace. An act of public indecorum is also a breach of the peace." Galvin v. State, 6 Coldw. 294.

The term "breach of the peace" is generic, and includes riotous and unlawful assemblies, riots, affray, forcible entry and detainer, the wanton discharge of fire-arms so near the chamber of a sick person as to cause injury, the sending of challenges and provoking to fight, going armed in public without lawful occasion, in such manner as to alarm the public, and many other acts of a similar character. The wanton discharge of fire-arms in the public streets of a city is well calculated to alarm the public, and cause them to be apprehensive of individual safety; and I think the judge was entirely correct when he instructed the jury that such act constituted a breach of the peace. People v. Bartz, 58 Mich. 486.

By "peace," as used in the law in this connection, is meant the tranquillity enjoyed by citizens of a municipality or community where good order reigns among its members. It is the natural right of all persons in political society, and any intentional violation of that right is "a breach of the 13 L. R. A.

peace." It is the offense of disturbing the public peace, or violation of public order or public decorum. Actual personal violence is not an essential element in the offense. Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514.

Examples of the offense.

The following examples of the offense are from Desty's American Criminal Law, § 91: "Riding or going armed with dangerous or unusual weapons (State v. Huntly, 3 Ired. L. 418. See 4 Bl. Com. 149; 2 Bishop, Cr. L. 6th ed. § 540); driving a carriage through a crowded street at a rate of speed such as to endanger the safety of pedestrians (United States v. Hart, 3 Wheel. C. C. 304, Pet. C. C. 390); entering on land by force, and throwing out a person who has a naked possession (Higgins v. State, 7 Ind. 549. See 2 Bishop, Cr. L. 6th ed. § 536; 2 Archb. Crim. Pr. 330; 4 Bl. Com. 148); spreading false news to create discord between persons high in office (see Bl. Com. 149; 2 Inst. 226; 3 Inst. 98); false and pretended prophecies, with intent to disturb the peace and terrify the people. See 4 Bl. Com. 149. The offense of a common brawler may be committed by mere epithets used in the heat of private quarrel, if so public as to disturb the peace of the neighborhood. Com. v. Foley, 99 Mass. 497. Counseling or advising a breach of the public peace is a misdemeanor. Com. v. Willard, 79 Mass. 476. So, conspiring to make a breach of the peace is an offense. Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Campb. 358. An infant over fourteen years of age may be guilty of a breach of the peace. Bullock v. Babcock, 3 Wend. 91. See 4 Bl. Com. 22; 1 Hale, P. C. 20. All parties engaged in a breach of the peace are principals."

To a complaint for beating a drum within the compact part of the town, without orders from a military officer, it is no defense to show that the act was done in the performance of religious worship, in accordance with a sense of religious duty

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Circuit Court for Mackinac County made during the trial of a prosecution against him for resisting an officer, which resulted in a verdict of guilty. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James J. Brown, for appellant:

There was no breach of the peace committed.

People v. Bartz, 58 Mich. 495; Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514; Ware v. Loveridge, 75 Mich. 492; Robison v. Miner, 13 West. Rep. 471, 68 Mich. 549.

The offense was not committed in the presence of the officer, so as to authorize him to arrest respondent without a written warrant from a magistrate.

People v. Burtz, supra.

The law does not look with favor on arrests made without a warrant, and it cannot be justified if the person arrested was not engaged in a breach of the peace, as for example, in fighting, or in a riot, or about to escape after having committed a felony.

Pinkerton v. Verberg, 7 L. R. A. 507, 78 Mich. 599.

Mesrs. Adolphus A. Ellis, Atty-Gen., and P. N. Packard, Pros. Atty., for the People.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Main Street, in the Village of Naubinway, Mackinac County, runs east and west. A street runs north from Main Street, upon which is located the house of one Bruce. Between 9 and 10 o'clock of the 28th day of December, 1890, as the respondent, John Johnson, and one McAllister were walking along Main Street, Johnson "shouted" or "whooped" in a loud voice twice. The shout was heard by Frank Murray who was marshal of the village, and who was at the time standing upon the door-step of Mr. Bruce's house. He started towards Main Street, and proceeded down that street until he came to Johnson and McAllister, and asked, "Who done that hollering?" and McAllister replied that it was Johnson, and he then arrested him for it, and attempted to take him to the jail or lockup. Johnson resisted, and Murray used his club, and sent for Deputy-sheriff Lull, whereupon they handcuffed Johnson, and dragged him to the jail. It is not necessary in this action to describe or comment upon the conduct of Murray while taking his prisoner to the jail, and after they arrived there. The prosecuting attorney filed an information against Johnson "for resisting the officer, Frank Murray, while in the lawful execution of the duties of his office in attempting to arrest him, the said Johnson, for then and there being drunk, intoxicated, disorderly, and yelling, and disturbing the public peace, in the public streets of the Village of Naubinway, in the presence of him, the said Frank Murray, he, the said Frank Murray, being then and there engaged in his lawful attempts to maintain, preserve, and keep the peace," etc. Upon trial Johnson was convicted. There was a conflict of testimony as to what occurred at the time of the arrest, but in the rulings here made we have taken the testimony of the people as that upon which the conviction must stand if it can be supported. By Murray's testimony he was over 150 feet away, and upon another street, when he heard the shout. There is no testimony showing that he was in sight of Johnson and McAllister, nor that he knew who it was who shouted, but based his arrest upon the statement of McAllister that it was Johnson. There was not any riot, noise, or disturbance when he reached them. No other persons are shown to have been upon and that no actual disturbance of the public peace resulted from it. State v. White, 2 New Eng. Rep. 867, 64 N. H. 48; State v. Priest, 2 New Eng. Rep. 867, 64 N. H. 48.

An ordinance prohibiting any person or association from marching through the streets with musical instruments, or singing or shouting, without first having obtained consent of the municipal authorities, is null and void as interfering with equal rights of citizens and not being a reasonable regulation of streets. Re Frazee, 6 West. Rep. 140, 68 Mich. 366.

A city ordinance imposing a penalty of fine and imprisonment when any person shall make any noise, riot, disturbance or improper diversion is construed to mean unreasonable noise of a nature disturbing to the community. State v. Cantieny, 34 Minn. 1.

A charge of the court instructing the jury as follows: "When the natural and legitimate consequences of obscene or vulgar language, or of cursing or swearing, would be to disturb the inhabitants of a place, then you are instructed that, in law, it would be used in a manner calculated to disturb the inhabitants of such place," is erroneous, as it is an invasion of the province of the jury. McCandless v. State, 21 Tex. App. 411.

Where evidence was held insufficient to support conviction for disturbing peace by cursing in public place, see Williams v. State, 21 Tex. App. 256.

An indictment for disturbing religious worship "by talking and laughing" and by indecent gestures, is not bad for duplicity. It charges but one offense, the words "by talking and laughing" being mere surplusage. State v. Bledsoe, 47 Ark. 233.

A complaint for drunkenness must specifically state the place where the defendant was seen intoxicated. To state the name of the city or town is not sufficient. State v. McLoon, 3 New Eng. Rep. 172, 78 Me. 420.

The averment, in an indictment, that the defendant did "unlawfully engage in a prize fight with the said J. K.,—to wit, did then and there enter a ring, commonly called a 'prize ring,' and did then and there, in the said ring, strike and bruise the said J. K.," does not show that both parties engaged in the fight, and is not a sufficient allegation of the offense to sustain a conviction. Sullivan v. State, 67 Miss. 346.

Two or more persons fighting by agreement in a public place are guilty of an affray. An affray is distinguished from a riot in not being premeditated. Supreme Council O. C. F., v. Garrigus, 1 West. Rep. 861, 104 Ind. 153.

A complaint that a person applied to another a profane epithet at the latter person's residence does not charge a violation of a municipal ordinance providing for the conviction of all persons who shall make, aid, etc., any improper noise, riot, or breach of the peace on the streets, highways, or elsewhere within the city. State v. Camden, 53 N. J. L. 289.

A count in an indictment is deemed sufficient

Main Street when Murray first accosted Johnson and McAllister. He had no warrant for the arrest of either Johnson or McAllister. Under the facts above stated two questions are raised: (1) Did Johnson, by the act of "shouting" or "whooping" in the public street of the village when on his way home, accompanied by McAllister, at the time of night stated, commit a breach of the peace? (2) If yes, was the offense committed in the presence of the officer, Murray?

We have had occasion to define the substance and nature of this offense in the following cases: Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 576; Way's Case, 41 Mich. 299; People v. Bartz, 53 Mich. 495; Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514; Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549; Ware v. Loveridge, 75 Mich. 492.

In general terms the offense is a violation of public order, a disturbance of the public tranquillity, by any act or conduct inciting to violence, or tending to provoke or excite others to break the peace. Each case where the offense is charged must depend upon the time, place and circumstances of the act. The circuit judge instructed the jury that "to be intoxicated and yelling on the public streets of a village in such a manner as to disturb the good order and tranquillity of that village would be an act of open violence, and would be a breach of the peace, which, if committed in the presence of an officer, would justify him in making the arrest." This was a correct statement of the law, and was applicable, under the testimony in this case. Hawley, Arrest, p. 38; Moseley v. State, 23 Tex. App. 409; State v. Lafferty, 5 Harr. (Del.) 491; Bryan v. Bates, 15 Ill. 87; State v. Freeman, 86 N. C. 683; City Council v. Payne, 2 Nott & McC. 475; State v. Bowen, 17 S. C. 58.

2. Was the offense committed in the presence of the officer, Murray, so as to authorize him to make the arrest without a warrant? To restate the facts: Johnson was not in the view of the officer. He did not know who it was that raised the shout. He arrived at the place after the occurrence, and inquired, "Who done that hollering?" and was told by McAllister that it was Johnson, and he then arrested him. At that time Johnson was not engaged in making any noise or disturbance. At the time the officer heard the shout he was over 150 feet away, upon another street. It was not in his presence, and when he arrived there was perfect tranquillity. To authorize an arrest without a warrant the offense must be committed in the presence of the officer, and the arrest must be made immediately. The officer did not act upon his own knowledge, but upon information he had gained by inquiries from McAllister. If he could make the arrest under such circumstances without a warrant, then there is no reason why he could not have made it the next day, or a week after, upon inquiry and information that Johnson was the person whom he heard shouting. People v. Bartz, 53 Mich. 498, is cited as supporting the proposition that the offense was committed in the presence of Murray. The facts in that case were different from the facts in this. In that case the officer who made the arrest saw the flash made when the pistol was discharged, heard the report, and saw the respondent Bartz, and pursued and arrested him. Bartz had not been out of sight of the officer from the time he discharged the pistol until the officer overtook and arrested him.

It is claimed by counsel for the people that Johnson, being intoxicated in a public street, was liable to be arrested therefor without warrant, under section 1, Act No. 4, Pub. Acts 1887, and section 2893, How.

which charges that respondent "quarreled . . . by cursing . . . and calling . . . opprobrious names, . . . which carriage . . . had the effect . . . to disturb the public peace," although there was no allegation of malicious or criminal intent. State v. Archibald, 4 New Eng. Rep. 112, 69 Vt. 548.

Under a statute providing that a person who disturbs the public peace by tumultuous and offensive carriage, etc., shall be punished, etc., the sufficiency of a count charging that respondent broke the public peace "by his tumultuous carriage" is doubted. Ibid.

A conviction may be had for approaching the dwelling-house of another, and using abusive, insulting, or obscene language in the presence or hearing of his family, although defendant was at the time on his own premises and used the words in ordinary conversation, without the intent of being overheard by others. Mullens v. State, 82 Ala. 42.

A conviction may be had for disturbing religious exercises on proof that defendant willfully and intentionally engaged in a fight, without justification or necessity, at or near a place where people were engaged in worship, even though he did not provoke the difficulty or strike the first blow. Goulding v. State, 82 Ala. 48.

A conviction for disturbing a religious congregation cannot be had upon a special verdict that defendant engaged in a fight near a church, and that the audience was not disturbed except by the sensational report that there was a fight. State v. Kirby, 108 N. C. 772.

Threatening in an angry manner to "slap hell out 13 L. R. A.

of a person" if he did not "dry up," and to kill him if he got up out of his chair, is not tumultuous or offensive conduct when not done in the immediate presence or hearing of such person's family. Brooks v. State, 67 Miss. 577.

The uttering, by a speaker at a public meeting, of expressions of sympathy for the condemned anarchists who had been executed for murder, with a glorification of their deeds and an incitement to murder the officers for discharging a public duty, is a misdemeanor under the New York Unlawful Assemblage Act. People v. Most, 29 N. Y. S. R. 97.

An indictment charging that defendant "unlawfully did make use of violent, abusive and insulting language towards and about one . . . in his presence and hearing, which language, in its common acceptance, was calculated to arouse to anger him, the said . . . and cause a breach of the peace,"—sufficiently charges the offense without particularizing the abusive language. Moore v. State, 60 Ark. 25.

The fact that a woman, in whose hearing obscene language is used, is herself in the habit of using such language can in no case constitute a justification, but may mitigate the offense. Golson v. State, 86 Ala. 601.

Insulting and abusive language used towards one in the immediate presence of his family may be a breach of the peace at common law. Ware v. Loveridge, 75 Mich. 488.

For recent decisions on the subject of "arrest for misdemeanors without warrant," see note to State v. Hunter (N. C.) 8 L. R. A. 529.

Stat. But this position is one taken in this court for the first time. The case was tried below upon the charge and theory that Murray made the arrest for a breach of the peace. The officer made the arrest for that offense, as is apparent from his inquiry of Mr. McAllister. He did not inform Johnson that he arrested him for being intoxicated, and does not testify that he was intoxicated. McAllister is the only one who testified that Johnson was intoxicated, and that he was taking him home. The judge put the case to the jury upon the theory that the arrest was made for committing a breach of the peace, and the people will not be permitted, after trial and conviction of respondent upon that theory, to change ground, and claim that he was arrested for being intoxicated under the Act cited.

The judgment must be reversed, and the prisoner discharged.

The other Justices concurred.

(... Vt.)

1. A corporation of another State "is taxed by such State for all its stock" within the meaning of Rev. Laws, § 270, so as to relieve stockholders in Vermont from a tax on their shares, when it is subject to an annual tax assessed according to the amount of its paid-up capital.

2. A foreign country is "another State," within the meaning of Rev. Laws, § 270, exempting stockholders in Vermont from a tax on their shares of a foreign corporation if the stock is taxed where the corporation is situated.

(May 9, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Orleans County Court, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain personal property, which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendant. Reversed.

Defendant justified as collector of taxes for the Town of Derby under a tax warrant, issued to him by the town treasurer. Plaintiff claimed that the tax list was invalid because certain shares of stock in the Eastern Townships Bank of Sherbrooke, in the Province of Quebec, were listed against him, when such shares were exempted from taxation by Rev. Laws, § 270.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Laforest H. Thompson, with Mr. C. A. Prouty, for plaintiff:

To justify the taking of plaintiff's property by defendant as tax collector, he must have a legal warrant and a legal tax.

Clove Spring Iron Works v. Cone, 56 Vt. 604; Rouell v. Horton, 57 Vt. 81; Hughes v. Vail, Id. 42.

The Eastern Townships Bank stock owned by plaintiff was exempt from taxation, and plaintiff's grand list was rendered illegal by putting this stock into it by the listers.

NOTE.—Taxation of capital of corporation.

The capital of a corporation means all the property belonging to it, whether tangible or intangible, which must be valued as capital for the purpose of taxation. Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561; Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 602.

The term "capital stock," as used in the Statute, does not refer to or embrace shares, but is intended to embrace the property of the corporation subject to taxation. Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 561.

It is the aggregate sum paid in or to be paid in by the shareholders, with the addition of the profits after deduction of losses. People v. Tax Comrs. 23 N. Y. 219.

The Legislature may rightfully provide for taxing the capital stock of a corporation instead of the shares, and require the corporation to pay the tax, leaving it to deduct the same from the dividends. Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 566.

The capital of a corporation and its shares of stock are distinct properties, and a tax levied upon the property of one is not in a legal sense levied upon the property of the other. Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. 82 N. C. 415; Jones v. Davis, 35 Ohio St. 474.

When the capital stock is taxable, the shares of stock are exempt from taxation in the hands of stockholders. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Pollak, 75 Ill. 208.

The exemption of the one will not necessarily exempt the other. Memphis v. Farrington, 8 Baxt. 539.

The capital stock is usually the representative of the property of the corporation, and such property is the representative of the capital stock, and for purposes of taxation it is represented by whatever it is invested in. *New London Sav. In the exemption, as found in Rev. Laws, 270, "shares of stock" first line, "stock" second line and "stock" last line, must be held to mean the share or interest owned by the individual, and not the capital owned and controlled by the corporation. If there could be any doubt when looking to this clause alone, there cannot be when it is compared with the Act of 1857 and the Act of 1858.

Pratt v. Boston Street Comrs. 139 Mass. 559-563.

Tyler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The most important question that arises in the case is whether or not the plaintiff's Eastern Townships Bank stock is taxable in this State. Rev. Laws, § 267, requires that all real and personal estate, except as otherwise provided, be set in the list at 1 per cent of its value in money on the first day of April of the year of its appraisal. Section 288 provides that shares of stock in bank shall be set in the list like other personal estate, to the owner thereof, in the town where he resides, if he resides in this State. Therefore this property should bear its proportion of the burden of taxation unless it falls within the exemption of the second division of § 270, Rev. Laws, which is as follows: "Shares of stock in a corporation situated in another State, when all the stock of such corporation is taxed in such State to the holders, whether residing within or without such State, or when the corporation is taxed in such State for all its stock." It appears by the agreed statement that the plaintiff's shares of stock were not taxed in Canada. The law of the Province of Quebec imposes a direct tax upon banks and certain other corporations, and takes no notice of the individual shareholders for the purpose of taxation. Act 45 Vict., chap. 22, is entitled "An Act to Impose Certain Direct Taxes on Certain Commercial Corporations." Section 1 enumerates the corporations which shall annually pay the several taxes specified in section 3, in order to provide for the exigencies of the public service, and includes banks in the enumeration. Section 3 reads: "The annual taxes imposed upon and payable by the commercial corporations mentioned and specified in section 1 of this Act shall be as follows: (1) Banks. (a) Five hundred dollars, when the paid-up capital of the bank is five hundred thousand dollars or less than that sum; one thousand dollars, when the paid-up capital is from five hundred thousand dollars to one million dollars; and an additional sum of two hundred dollars for each million or fraction of a million dollars of the paid-up capital from one million dollars to three million dollars; and a further additional sum of one hundred dollars for each million or fraction of a million dollars of the paid-up capital over three million dollars. (b) An additional tax of one hundred dollars for each office or place of business in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, and of twenty dollars for each office or place of business in every other place."

The above Act was passed by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, May 27, 1882, and was operative upon the Eastern Townships Bank, which was located in Sherbrooke, in that Province, and doing business there with a capital of $1,500,000. This bank has been taxed and has paid its taxes each year since the passage of the Act, in compliance with its requirements. No question can now be raised but that the Legislature had authority to pass the Act. It derived its power to legislate from the British North American Act of 1867, by which the Dominion of Canada was formed. That Act provides that in each province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of 18 L. R. A.

subjects enumerated; that is to say, "direct taxation within the province, in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes." This authority of the Legislature and the rights of the government to collect taxes under the Act, was contested by certain banks and other corporations in several suits, which finally passed by appeal to the privy council of England, where it was held, sustaining the decree of the Queen's Bench, that the tax imposed was not a tax upon any commodity which the banks dealt in and could sell at enhanced prices to their customers; that it was not a tax on their profits nor upon their several transactions; but that it was a tax of a direct lump sum, assessed by simple reference to their paid-up capital and their places of business. The plaintiff, in the year 1888, was a resident and taxpayer in the Town of Derby, in this State, and the owner of 100 shares of stock in this bank, which the listers of that town set to him, with his other personal estate, in the grand list, so that the same was assessed for taxes that year. The question is whether the payment of the annual tax by the bank to the Canadian government brings the case within the exemption provided by our Rev. Laws, § 270, above quoted. There are but three kinds of taxation to which corporations can be subjected, namely: upon their real and personal property, upon their franchises, and upon their capital stock. A reference to the Canadian Statute shows that this tax was imposed upon corporations, without any reference to the amount or value of their property, or its use, capacity, or productiveness. It is almost equally clear that it was not designed as a franchise tax,—a tax upon the privilege of carrying on business under corporate organizations within the province. Generally, when the latter tax is imposed, means are adopted to ascertain the value of the franchise, as indicated by the amount of business done by the corporation taxed. In this case the Provincial Legislature graduated its taxation of corporations, not according to the value of their corporate franchise, nor the amount of their business, but solely according to the amount of their paid-up capital. "Capital" and "capital stock" are in legal intentment synonymous, and are used in legislative Acts as equivalent terms, though strictly not of the same meaning. It is said in 1 Desty, Taxation, 358, that "capital" and "capital stock" are in legal intentment synonymous, and are used in legislative Acts as equivalent terms, though strictly not of the same meaning; that "capital stock" means, not shares of stock either separately or in the aggregate, but it is intended to designate the property of the corporation subject to taxation, not in separate parcels, but in a homogeneous unity. In Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, somewhat different language is used. Chief Justice Waite speaks of the money paid in by subscribers for the shares of the capital stock as constituting the capital of the corporation, although the stock created by such subscription and payment was the property of the several holders of the shares; also of the aggregate of the subscriptions making the aggregate of the stock, and each subscriber owning that part of the stock which his shares represent. He says that, as capital, it belongs to the corporation, but as stock it belongs to the holders of the shares into which the capital is divided. In that case the capital stock of the railroad company was exempt by its charter from taxation, and it was held that the shares were for that reason also exempt.

Courts and law-writers doubtless mean the same thing. They only differ in forms of expression. Though the capital stock of a corporation is produced by the payment of subscriptions for shares, the aggregate of shares and capital stock are not identical. When the capital is divided into shares and sold, the corporation ceases to be the owner of them. They then become the private property of the individual holders, while the money paid for them becomes the property of the corporation,—its capital or capital stock, with which to transact the business for which it was organized. Shares and stock are thus closely related. The court said in Louisville First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701, that shares, in their aggregate totality, are sometimes called the "capital stock" of a bank, though a different thing from its moneyed capital. Cooley, Taxn. 169, says: "So a tax on the shares of stockholders in a corporation is a different thing from a tax on the corporation itself, or its stock, and may be laid irrespective of any taxation of the corporation, when no contract relations forbid." Upon this ground the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases referred to by defendant's counsel, has held that shares of stock in a corporation may be taxed although a tax has been laid upon the entire capital.

Counsel for the plaintiff concede that "shares of stock" and "capital stock" are not one and the same thing, and that it is within the power of the Legislature to lay a tax upon both; but they contend that, as the value of the shares depends upon the amount and value of the capital, a tax upon the latter is in effect a tax upon the former; that the amount of the dividends is necessarily diminished by the amount of the tax paid upon its capital stock. By the term "all its stock," which is employed in section 270 of our Statute, is not meant the aggregate of shares into which the capital stock of a corporation is divided, but the moneyed capital which was produced by the payment by the stockholders for their shares. "Taxes" are defined as being the enforced proportional contribution of persons and property levied by the authority of the State, for the support of government and for all public needs. By the laws of the Province of Quebec, the entire capital stock of the Eastern Townships Bank was made to contribute its proportion of the expense of supporting the government under which it existed and transacted business. The question before us is not what the Legislature of this State had the power to do in respect to the taxation of shares held by our citizens in a foreign corporation when the capital stock of the corporation has been taxed in the State in which it is located. We are to construe our Statute as it stands; and it seems to us that the only reasonable construction to be given it is that it was intended to provide for such a case as this; that, the capital stock of this corporation having borne its proportion of the public burden in one jurisdiction, its shares held here are exempt from taxation. We think the word "State" employed in the Statute should be construed to mean a foreign State as well as one of the United States. The Statute was enacted for the relief and benefit of stockholders; therefore, upon the reason of the law, shares of stock in a foreign corporation should be exempt as well as those in a corporation located in one of the States of this Union. The view that we have taken of the first question in the case renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions presented in the exceptions.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for the plaintiff to recover the value of the property, as appears in the agreed statement, with interest.

Mr. A. G. Smith for appellant.

Messrs. W. E. Niblack and A. J. Beveridge for appellees.

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an application by the appellees, the Board of Commissioners of the State Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, for a writ of mandate against the appellant, as Auditor of State. The controversy can be best stated by quoting the complaint, which is brief, and, omitting prefatory matter, is as follows:

"Your petitioners, George J. Langsdale, Thomas W. Bennett, Mahlon D. Manson, Geo. W. Johnston and DeWitt C. McCollum, respectfully say that they constitute the Board of Commissioners of the State Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, provided for by the Act known as 'An Act to Provide for the Creation of a State Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument or Memorial Hall or Monument and Memorial Hall Combined, According to the Discretion of the Trustees in This Act Provided for, and Declaring an Emergency,' approved March 8, 1887; that said Board of Commissioners, soon after its organization, proceeded to erect a Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, as provided in said Act, at an estimated cost not exceeding two hundred thousand ($200,000) dollars, the amount appropriated by said Act; that the sum of ninety-nine thousand and four hundred and forty-one dollars and eleven cents ($99,441.11) has been expended in structural expenses upon said monument; and that contracts are outstanding for additional work to be performed upon, and material to be used in the erection of, said monument, to meet and discharge which the further sum of ninety thousand nine hundred and eighty-two dollars and sixty cents ($90,982.60) will be required; that other sums of money have been expended, as incidental expenses, by said Board of Commissioners in the discharge of their duties, which have devolved upon them, no part of which incidental expenses has been applied in payment of the structural expenses hereinabove referred to, and which your petitioners are advised and believe are not properly payable out of the amount appropriated by the Act for the erection of the monument in question, as follows:

For payment of architects, including plans and model,	$10,348.85
For Commissioners' per diem , traveling and hotel expenses	$8,879.82
For engineering	15.00

"Your petitioners say that said several sums of money are merely incidental expenses; that no part of them are structural expenses; but notwithstanding the fact that said sums are purely and solely incidental expenses, they have nevertheless been paid by the treasurer of state upon warrants issued by the Auditor of State, and against and in the face of the repeated request of said Board of Commissioners not to do so, and their repeated protest against so doing, have been by said Auditor of State charged to and against the fund of two hundred thousand ($200,000) dollars created and set apart by the above-recited Act, for the erection of a soldiers' and sailors' monument, known as the 'Monumental Fund'; that they, said petitioners, have demanded of John O. Henderson, who is the present Auditor of State, that he shall transfer the several sums, all of which are purely incidental expenses, from said monument fund, and charge the same to and over against the general fund in the hands of the treasurer of state, for the payment of current expenses, and that the said John O. Henderson has failed and refused, and still fails and refuses, to comply with their said demand either in whole or in part or in any respect.

"Wherefore, your petitioners pray that an alternative writ of mandate shall be issued and directed to the said John O. Henderson, requiring him to so transfer said several sums of money so paid and classified, as merely incidental expenses, from said monument fund, and to charge the same to and over against what is known as the general fund in the state treasury, as above stated, or else to show cause why he shall not or ought not to do so, and will ever pray.

"George J. Langsdale, President.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, a notary public in and for the County of Marion, State of Indiana, this 20th day of April, 1891.

"(Seal) Eva Edwards, Notary Public."

The appellee appeared, waived the issuance of an alternative writ of mandate and demurred to the petition on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to an alternative or peremptory writ of mandate. The demurrer was overruled and the appellant, excepting to the ruling, declined to plead further. Judgment was rendered, awarding a peremptory writ of mandate, and from such judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The questions presented call for a construction of the Act approved March 3, 1887, known as the State Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument Act. Acts of 1887, 30; Elliott's Supp. § 2048.

The appellee insists that the sum of $200,000 appropriated by that Act was intended by the Legislature to be devoted solely to the structural expense of erecting the monument; that no part of it was to be used for the payment of incidental expenses, and that all incidental expenses are to be paid from the general fund in the state treasury. The appellant's contention is, that the sum appropriated was intended to cover the entire amount to be paid by the State toward the erection of the monument, and that there is no appropriation of any other sum for the payment of incidental expenses.

The provisions of the Act in question are substantially as follows:

"Section 1. The sum of two hundred thousand dollars . . . is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting a State Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, said appropriation to be used in connection with such other funds as have already been or may hereafter be donated and contributed for that purpose."

Section 2 provides for the appointment of five commissioners, prescribes their oath of office, requires them to each give bond in the sum of $5,000 for the faithful performance of their duties; and further conditioned that the cost of the monument shall not exceed the appropriation, with donations and contributions, fixes their compensation at four dollars per day and traveling expenses and provides for the filling of vacancies.

Section 3 prescribes certain of their duties, locates the monument in Circle Park in the City of Indianapolis, and authorizes the making of certain contracts with the city.

Section 4 requires the Commissioners to prepare, select or adopt a design for the monument, to advertise for plans, designs and specifications; to offer a premium of $1,000 for the best, and $500 for the second best design, with authority to reject any and all designs offered and to advertise as often as may be necessary to procure suitable designs and plans, and authorizing them to employ experts to examine all plans and test all estimates submitted.

Section 5 authorizes the letting of contracts for the work and prescribes the manner of paying the contractors.

Section 6 prescribes the material to be used in the erection of the monument, and requires the architect to give bond, with sureties, in the penal sum of $10,000, "conditioned that said plans shall be perfect and complete for the purpose designed and intended, and that the monument shall be fully completed and finished as a whole, and in every part, for and within the price and cost estimated and fixed by such architect; and which price or cost shall be stated in his proposition or submission of plan and specification."

This section also forbids the making of any change in the plans or specifications which will increase the aggregate cost of the monument so as to exceed the cost prescribed in the Act.

Section 7 authorizes the appointment of a secretary, prescribes his duties, and fixes his compensation at $75 per month.

Section 8 authorizes the commissioner to employ a superintendent, whose duties and compensation they are authorized to fix.

Section 9 forbids members and officers of the Board to have any interest in any contract connected with the erection of the monument, and prescribes penalties.

Section 10 makes the architect whose plans are accepted the supervising architect, requires of him a bond as such supervising architect, and provides for his compensation.

The case of Campbell v. State S. & S. Mon. Comrs., 115 Ind. 591, involved the construction of this Act. It was there held that it was the intention of the Legislature that the entire sum of $200,000 appropriated should be devoted, so far as used at all, to the structural work of the monument, and that all incidental expenses, such as are involved in this case, must be paid from the general fund in the state treasury, and that there was sufficient in the Act to operate as an appropriation, authorizing the Auditor of State to draw warrants on the treasurer of state to pay the same. That case is vigorously attacked by the appellant, and we are asked to overrule it. It is manifest that if Campbell v. State S. & S. Mon. Comrs. was correctly decided, it is decisive of the case now before us. After careful consideration of the question, we are of the opinion that the conclusion reached in Campbell v. State S. & S. Mon. Comrs. was correct.

Section one of the Act appropriated $200,000 for the purpose of erecting a monument. Section 4 provides for advertising for plans and specifications for a monument to cost not exceeding that amount. The commissioners and architect each and all give bond that it shall not exceed in cost that amount. If the incidental expenses are all to be deducted from the $200,000, how can the board of commissioners or the architect act safely and intelligently in the preparation and acceptance of plans and specifications? If they understand that a certain definite sum is available for structural work, they have a tangible basis upon which to calculate. The Act compels the incurring of certain incidental expenses, the amount of which is necessarily uncertain. No one can tell in advance what events may occur to delay or prolong the prosecution of the work, or how much time the Commissioners may have to give to it. It cannot be foretold how often they may have to advertise for plans and specifications before such plans will be submitted as will meet the requirements. Nor could they tell in advance how often they might be compelled to employ experts to assist in the selection of plans and test estimates. Already incidental expenses have been incurred and paid amounting to more than $20,000. It is not claimed that any of these were not necessary to the proper prosecution of the work. It is not possible to foretell how much time will still be required for the completion of the work; and, as a consequence, how much additional must be paid for salaries and other incidental expenses.

When the commissioners advertised, inviting plans and specifications, upon what basis were architects invited to make their estimates? Did the Legislature intend to say to them, "First guess on the probable amount of the $200,000 which will be absorbed in incidental expenses, and bind yourself with sureties in the penal sum of $10,000 that your guess is right?"

To give to the Act the construction contended for by the appellant would be to hold that the Legislature required at the hand of the commissioners and architects very unreasonable, if not impossible, things; but, if the intention of the Legislature was that the $200,000 should be devoted alone to the structural work, the commissioners could easily select a design and let a contract for the erection of a monument within the limits named.

The case of State House Comrs. v. Whittaker, 81 Ind. 297, is in point. The Legislature appropriated $2,000,000 for the building of a new state house, and limited the entire cost to $2,000,000. The provisions of the two Acts are very much alike; indeed, the Act providing for the erection of the monument is in many of its provisions, and in some entire sections, literal copies of the Act providing for the erection of a new state house, which will be found in the Acts of the Special Session of 1877, page 68. Like the Act now in question, that Act not only in express terms limited the cost of the building to $2,000,000, but also required the giving of bonds, both by the commissioners and by the architect. The bond required of the commissioners was conditioned that the cost of the building should not exceed $2,000,000, and the bond required of the architect was conditioned that the building should be "fully completed and finished as a whole, and in every part, for and within the cost and price estimated and fixed by such architect." The court held that the sum of $2,000,000 might be expended in the construction of the new state house; and that in addition thereto, all incidental expenses, such as salaries, traveling expenses of the board, compensation of architect, secretary and superintendent, rents, etc., might be paid out of the fund denominated the new "state house fund;" but that such expenses should not be deducted from the $2,000,000 which might be expended in what might strictly be called the construction of the building.

So, in this case, we hold that the sum of $200,000 appropriated for the erection of the monument can only be expended in the actual structural work, and that no part of it can properly be expended in the payment of merely incidental expenses.

Counsel for appellant insists that the case of State House Comrs. v. Whittaker, supra, is not authority because a special tax was levied for the collection of a special state house fund, while there is no special monument fund. This cannot affect the question, as the application of the sum limited for the erection of either structure is not made to depend upon the amount of money belonging to any special fund. The board of state house commissioners were limited to the expenditure of $3,000,000 in the erection of the state house, without regard to the amount realized from the special tax levied for that purpose.

The question remains, Is there an appropriation authorizing the Auditor of State to draw warrants on the treasurer of state for the payment of the incidental expenses?

In Campbell v. State S. & S. Mon. Comrs., supra, the court said: "It is true, as claimed, that no money can be rightfully drawn from the treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law, but such an appropriation may be made impliedly, as well as expressly; and in general as well as in specific terms. . . . The use of technical words in a statute making an appropriation is not necessary. There may be an appropriation of public moneys to a given purpose without in any manner designating the act as an appropriation. It may be said, generally, that a direction to the proper officer or officers to pay money out of the treasury on a given claim, or class of claims, or for a given object, may by implication be held to be an appropriation of a sufficient amount of money to make the required payments,"—citing Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 328.

It is possible, as claimed by the appellant, that the language above quoted was outside of the question before the court in that case. It however states the law correctly and we fully approve and adopt it.

The eighth subdivision of section 5611, Rev. Stat. 1881, authorizes the Auditor of State to "draw warrants on the treasurer for all moneys directed by law to be paid out of the treasury to public officers, or for any other object whatsoever, as the same may become payable." The Act providing for the erection of the monument expressly authorizes the incurring of each of said several items of incidental expenses, and directs that the same shall be paid. We think there is a sufficient appropriation to make it the duty of the appellant to draw warrants for the payment of the same. For a very full discussion of what constitutes an appropriation of money, see the case of Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 11 L. R. A. 370.

The judgment of the Marion Circuit Court is affirmed, with costs.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Julian & Julian for appellants.

Messrs. Fox & Robbins for appellee.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the appellants against the appellee to recover certain real estate in Centerville, Wayne County. The complaint was in four paragraphs. A demurrer was sustained to the second paragraph, and cause put at issue by answer in denial. The errors assigned in this court relate only to the overruling of a motion made by the appellants for a new trial, and on exceptions to the conclusions of law upon the special findings of fact. The motion for a new trial was predicated upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding. We have read the evidence carefully, and find that it fully and without conflict sustains the finding of facts made by the court. The special finding, omitting description of real estate, is as follows, viz.: "Having been requested by the plaintiffs in said cause to make a special finding of facts herein, and conclusions of law thereon, now find: That William Sumner was a resident of Centerville, Wayne County, Ind., from the year 1818 to the year 1840, at which last-named date he removed to Hamilton County, Ind., where he died intestate in the year 1868; that he left surviving him as his sole heirs four children, the plaintiffs in this suit, and Thomas Sumner, who died in 1883, leaving surviving him, — Sumner, his wife; that between the years 1818 and 1820 the said William Sumner was the owner in fee simple of — acres of real estate in the Town of Centerville, and in the vicinity thereof, and was interested in the development of the town; that prior to the year 1816 the county-seat of said Wayne County was fixed at Salesbury, and subsequently, by an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana approved December 21, 1816, it was enacted that, from and after the 1st day of August, 1817, the seat of justice in and for said county should be removed to and permanently fixed in the Town of Centerville, in said county, and on the 1st day of August, 1817, said seat of justice was, pursuant to said Act, removed to said Town of Centerville; that afterwards, to wit, on the 18th day of May, 1819, the said William Sumner being the owner of the following real estate, to wit, . . . did, in consideration of the seat of justice having been permanently established in the Town of Centerville, within and for said county, and for no other consideration, execute to Thomas J. Warman, Enos Grave, and Beah Butler, the commissioners of said county and their successors in office, for the use of said county forever, a warranty deed for the same; that said deed was duly recorded on the 18th day of May, 1819, in the recorder's office of said Wayne County, Ind., in Deed Record B, page 140; that on the — day of August, 1820, the new court-house at Centerville was completed and accepted by the said county commissioners of said county, and by them taken possession of, and on said date they consented to be entered their approval and acceptance of the deed of said William Sumner of May 18, 1819, in the record of their proceeding of said date, in the following words, to wit: 'William Sumner produced a deed for the public square in the Town of Centerville given by said Sumner and wife to and for the use of Wayne County, which deed was recorded in Book B, page 140, which deed was approved and accepted by the board.' That said real estate so conveyed by the said Sumner and wife to said county commissioners was thenceforward continuously used by said county for the purpose of a public square until the year 1873, at which date the county seat was removed from said Town of Centerville to the City of Richmond; that on the 7th day of March, 1874, the commissioners of said county, for a valuable consideration, sold and conveyed the west half of the same to one Sabra Jones, which deed was recorded in the recorder's office of Wayne County, Ind., in Deed Record 59, page 480, and on the 15th day of June, 1874, for a valuable consideration, they sold and conveyed the east half of the real estate to the said Sabra Jones, which deed was recorded in the recorder's office of Wayne County, Ind., in Deed Record 59, page 478; that said Sabra Jones took possession of said real estate on said dates, respectively, and that, after various transfers by deeds duly executed and recorded, the following part of the real estate included in the land conveyed by said William Sumner to the said county commissioners by deed of May 18, 1819, was conveyed on the 4th day of March, 1884, to defendant William J. Darnell, who now holds possession of the same; that said deed was duly recorded in the recorder's office of said Wayne County, Ind., in Deed Record No. 80, at page 121; that prior to the commencement of this suit the plaintiffs demanded of the defendant the possession of the same." And, as a conclusion of law on the foregoing finding of facts, the court finds for the defendant. Proper exceptions were taken to the foregoing conclusions of law by the plaintiff, and this presents for our consideration the question discussed by counsel in their elaborate briefs.

The conclusions of law deduced by the court from the special findings are assailed upon several different grounds, one of which is the claim that, inasmuch as the deed was to "Thomas J. Worman, Enos Grave, and Beah Butler, commissioners of Wayne County, and their successors in office, for the use of said County of Wayne," it gave to the commissioners the legal title to hold as trustees, and limited the county to the mere use of the premises; and that by the removal of the county-seat the use was lost and forfeited, and the title vested eo instante in the grantor or his heirs. As we construe the grant, it was in legal effect and contemplation a conveyance to the county. Nothing in the lan-of a condition subsequent, the condition must expressly mention them. Page v. Palmer, 48 N. H. 385.

Words used in a deed will not be construed as a condition subsequent when any other reasonable construction can be given them. Wier v. Simmons, 56 Wis. 687.

The words "provided always, and this deed is upon the express condition" (Hammond v. Port Royal & A. R. Co. 15 S. C. 10), or "shall indemnify and save harmless," are necessary to express a condition subsequent. Michigan State Bank v. Hastings, 1 Doug. 225.

A deed, to a town, of land "for a burying place forever" does not convey an estate upon a condition subsequent. Rawson v. Uxbridge School Dist. No. 5, supra.

A conditional estate must be clearly and unequivocally indicated by express terms in the grant. Ibid.

So on a condition that grantee shall forever maintain a line fence, a neglect to do so after death of the grantee will not forfeit the land. Emerson v. Simpson, 48 N. H. 475.

A deed conveying land upon condition that no building or erection shall ever be made on the land except dwelling-houses, and outhouses for the same, shows merely by description what rights passed to grantee and what were retained by grantor, and that subsequent purchasers could not erect the prohibited buildings. Fuller v. Arme, 45 Vt. 400.

Where no time is fixed within which the conditions were to be performed, the law will allow a reasonable time. Ellis v. Kyger, 7 West. Rep. 749, 80 Mo. 600.

A party insisting on a forfeiture of an estate for breach of condition must bring himself clearly within its terms. Voris v. Benschaw, 49 Ill. 425.

Establishment of county seat.

A statute providing that the county seat of a county should be permanently established at a certain place, upon the fulfillment of certain prescribed terms and conditions, is not a contract, but the public law relating to a public subject, with respect to which a prior Legislature has no power to bind a subsequent one. Newton v. Mahoning County Comrs. 100 U. S. 543, 25 L. ed. 710.

Where the county erects a court-house on land conveyed to it, the removal of the county seat does not divest the county of its title, nor evidence its intent to abandon the property or to use it for other purposes. Poitevent v. Hancock County Suprs. 58 Miss. 810.

guage used indicates a design on the part of the grantor to vest the legal title in the commissioners and their successors as individuals, to act as trustees, rather than as the agents of the county, or to impose upon them any duties or obligations other than those required of them as public officers. The statute in force at that time did not, as does the present one, designate the corporate name and style to be assumed by boards of commissioners (Act approved December 17, 1816), and the form used in this deed was at that time commonly used in conveying property to corporations and quasi corporations in this State. It is significant, also, that the entry made upon the county records by the board of commissioners in accepting the deed was for a deed "to and for the use of Wayne County." See also Carder v. Fayette County Comrs. 16 Ohio St. 353; Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 212.

Another position taken by the appellants is stated in their brief as follows: "But this is not all we rely upon. The total failure of the consideration of the Sumner deed itself worked a loss of the county's claim, and gave to the Sumner heirs the right to assert their title to the square, independent of the condition subsequent." No authority is cited in support of this position, and we know of none that will sustain it. The duration or stability of the title to land does not ordinarily depend upon the certainty or stability of the consideration paid for it. But, independently of the legal question involved, the finding informs us that the county-seat remained at Centerville from the 1st day of August, 1817, until the year 1873, long after the grantor had removed from the county. We may reasonably suppose that, if the location of the county-seat at Centerville was of advantage to the grantor, he must have received some of the benefits during the half century it remained there, and that consequently there was not an entire failure of consideration. Hunt v. Beeson, 18 Ind. 380; Jeffersonville M. & I. R. Co. v. Barbour, 89 Ind. 375.

The remaining and principal contention of the appellants is that the conveyance of the land to or for the use of the county was conditioned in the seat of justice of Wayne County remaining permanently at Centerville, and that its removal to Richmond caused the land to revert to the appellants as the heirs of the grantor. The rule of strict construction applicable to conditions subsequent, usually expressed in the words, "conditions subsequent are not favored in law, and are construed strictly," is elementary, and does not require the citation of authorities. A condition subsequent that will defeat an estate created by a deed must be fairly expressed in the deed itself. The words used must create the condition. The court will not supply it, if the parties fail to express it. The rule is stated in 2 Devlin on Deeds, as follows: "Sec. 976. Parol condition. Aside from the question of a reformation of a deed in cases where clauses have been omitted by mistake, it is certain that, in an action to recover property conveyed by deed on the ground that a condition on which it was made has not been performed, the deed must speak for itself, and a condition cannot be ingrafted upon a deed absolute in form by parol evidence. The ingrafting of a contemporaneous condition in a deed will, in a proper action, be allowed only on clear evidence of fraud, accident, or mistake." A condition may be created by any words which show clear, unmistakable intention on the part of a grantor to create an estate on condition, regard being had to the whole of the deed in which they occur. The word "condition" need not be used, but words importing a condition must be used or plainly inferred from the instrument and the existing facts. Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 272; Laberee v. Carleton, 58 Me. 213; Rawson v. Uzbridge School Dist. No. 5, 7 Allen, 125; Packard v. Ames, 16 Gray, 327; Episcopal City Mission v. Appleton, 117 Mass. 327; Paschall v. Passmore, 15 Pa. 307; Wier v. Simmons, 55 Wis. 642; Raley v. County of Umatilla, 15 Or. 172; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 2. It appears from the finding, supra, that in the year 1816 the General Assembly passed an Act fixing the seat of justice for Wayne County permanently at Centerville from and after the 1st day of August, 1817, and that pursuant to the Act, on that day, it was removed to Centerville; that afterwards, on the 18th day of May, 1819, the lands in controversy were conveyed by a general warranty deed to the commissioners "for and in consideration of the seat of justice having been permanently established in the Town of Centerville, within and for said county, . . . for the use of said County of Wayne." No other words from which any condition, limitation, or right of re-entry by the grantor or his heirs can be inferred are expressed in the conveyance, or in the subsequent entry made by the board of commissioners accepting the deed. The cases cited by appellants' attorneys, and principally relied upon to show that this deed was conditioned on the seat of justice remaining at Centerville, will be examined in their order. The first one is Stanley v. Colt, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 119-163, 18 L. ed. 502, 508. This was an action to recover, for breach of condition, a tract of land devised by the plaintiff's ancestor to an ecclesiastical society in which the property was devised to the society, "to be and remain to the use and benefit of said Second or South Society, and their successors, forever." Then comes the condition or limitation upon the devise: "Provided, that said real estate be not ever hereafter sold or disposed of, but the same be leased or let," etc. The court held that there was not a condition subsequent, using these words: "Our conclusion is that the construction urged by the plaintiff of the will, importing a condition, a breach of which forfeits the devise, is not well founded." The next case cited is Hunt v. Beeson, 18 Ind. 380. In this case a lot was donated by the proprietor of a town for a "tan-yard," and was used as such from 1834 to 1858. The court held that it was donated upon a condition subsequent, the condition evidently being the erection of a tan-yard on the lot, and not the perpetual maintenance of the same; for the court held that the condition was fully performed, and that the property did not revert upon its subsequent sale and appropriation to other purposes. The case of Indianapolis P. & C. R. Co. v. Hood, 66 Ind. 580, was a conveyance of some lots to the company "for a site for the depot of said railroad at Peru, . . . to have and hold the premises . . . for the purposes aforesaid." The statement of the use and condition was much stronger than is contained in the deed under consideration, and it does not support the position of the appellants. We do not feel called upon to extend the rule in favor of conditions subsequent beyond that indicated in this case. The case of Scott v. Stipe, 12 Ind. 74, is not well reported, but as explained in Scanlin v. Garvin, 46 Ind. 275, does not sustain the appellants' contention; for it is said that the grant was upon condition that a church should be erected on the lot, and that it should "forever thereafter be used as a house of worship." Also see Cook v. Leggett, 88 Ind. 211. The case of Warren v. Lyon City, 22 Iowa, 351, was a suit by the grantor, who dedicated land for a "public square," to enjoin the city from leasing or selling the same. The case is not in point. In Henderson v. Hunter, 59 Pa. 335, the condition expressed in the grant to a church was, "so long as they use it for that purpose, and no longer, and then to return back to the original owner."

We are unable to find that any of the cases cited by appellants sustained their theory of this case. In Heaton v. Randolph County Comrs., 20 Ind. 398, the conveyance was to "the board of trustees of the county seminary of Randolph County, and their successors in office, forever, to have and to hold the premises aforesaid, with all the appurtenances, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of said 'board of trustees, for the use of said seminary forever.'" It was claimed that this created a condition subsequent, and that, the premises having ceased to be used as a seminary, the grantor was to receive the land. The court held that the corporation received an unconditional title, which was not defeated by the alleged failure to use the premises for the purposes of a seminary, or by using them for other purposes, that there was nothing in the deed that imports a condition; and that if the grantor intended that the property conveyed should only be used for a seminary edifice, or, in case it should be used otherwise, that the estate should be forfeited and revert the condition should have been expressed or fairly implied. In Seebold v. Shiller, 34 Pa. 183, land upon which a court-house and jail had been erected was conveyed to the commissioners by name, and their successors in office, "in trust for the use of the said county, in fee simple." The county was subsequently divided, the seat of justice removed, and trustees appointed to sell the lots. Held, that there was no reverter. In Adams v. County of Logan, 11 Ill. 336, a landowner proposed that, if the county-seat should be located at Pottsville, he would give land for a court-house and other county purposes. The proposition was accepted, and the General Assembly passed 13 L. R. A.;

"An Act to Locate Permanently the Seat of Justice of Logan County," and it was located at Pottsville. Subsequently the county-seat was removed. It was held that the grantor was without remedy. The suit was to recover the money rather than land, but it was held that the deed was unconditional. In Harris v. Shaw, 13 Ill. 456, land was conveyed to commissioners, by name, and their successors in office, for the use of a county forever, in consideration of one dollar, and that the county-seat had been located on the premises. The county-seat was afterwards removed, and the grantor sued to recover the land. It was held that there was no condition, and that he could not recover. The citation of authorities to this effect might be greatly extended, but we will refer to the following: Raley v. County of Umatilla, 15 Or. 172; Portland v. Terwilliger, 16 Or. 465; Coffin v. Portland, 16 Or. 77; Columbia First M. E. Church v. Old Columbia Pub. G. Co. 103 Pa. 608; Paschall v. Passmore, 15 Pa. 307; Raussen v. Uxbridge School Dist. No. 5, 7 Allen, 125; Packard v. Ames, 16 Gray, 327; Crane v. Hyde Park, 135 Mass. 147; Sohier v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1; Board of Suprs. v. Patterson, 56 Ill. 111; Lave v. Hyde, 39 Wis. 347; Wier v. Simmons, 55 Wis. 637; Brown v. Caldwell, 23 W. Va. 187; Southard v. Central R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 14; Barrie v. Smith, 47 Mich. 181; Gage v. School Dist. No. 7, 64 N. H. 232, 4 New Eng. Rep. 284; Page v. Palmer, 48 N. H. 387; Morrill v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 96 Mo. 174; Thornton v. Trammell, 39 Ga. 202.

It is questionable whether the appellants would be entitled to a recovery if the deed contained a condition subsequent. It appears from the finding that the county-seat remained at Centerville from 1817 to 1873, a period of fifty-six years, and that this suit was brought more than seventy years after the location of the seat of justice at Centerville. It may fairly be presumed that the grantor at the time he executed the deed to the commissioners owned other property, the value of which he expected would be enhanced by the location of the county-seat, or that he had other interests to be subserved thereby. If so, we may also infer that he received during his lifetime, and while a resident of Wayne County, the substantial benefit of his donation. In Hunt v. Beeson, 18 Ind. 380, it was held that the maintenance of a tan-yard for the period of twenty-four years was a substantial compliance with the condition contained in the conveyance. In Mead v. Ballard, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 290, 19 L. ed. 190, a conveyance, upon condition that an institute "shall be permanently located upon said lands," was complied with by the location of the institution thereon August 9, 1848, and its remaining there until 1857. In Jeffersonville M. & I. R. Co. v. Barbour, 39 Ind. 375, the use for thirty-three years of lands granted "expressly for the use and purpose of depot grounds," and providing that if not used for that purpose it should revert to the grantors, was held to be a performance of the condition, so as to prevent a forfeiture. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE of Indiana, ex rel. John WORRELL, Appl.,
v.

Bruce CARR, State Auditor.

(....Ind.....)

1. Payment of salary with full knowledge of the facts, to one who had previously been acting as a de facto officer, and who attempted to retain the office after the qualification of the officer de jure, is no defense to a claim for the salary by the officer de jure, at least where the latter has also been performing the duties of the office.
2. A provision in an Appropriation Act that the salary for a certain office shall be paid to a certain person named, and none other, and a statute providing a penalty for paying it to any other person than the one named, are absolutely void as attempts to exercise judicial powers by declaring who is the legal officer entitled to the salary.

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to compel defendant to draw a warrant on the state treasurer in favor of relator for the amount of the salary which relator alleged he had earned as chief of the bureau of statistics. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator filed his petition in this case, asking that a writ of mandate issue against the appellee, the Auditor of State, compelling him to draw his warrant on the treasurer of state in favor of the relator for the sum of $2,500, the amount alleged to be due the relator as his salary as chief of the bureau of Indiana statistics. Issues were joined on the complaint and a trial had. There were demurrers filed to the paragraphs of answer and overruled and exceptions reserved. Errors are assigned on these rulings. On proper request, there was a special finding of facts and conclusions of law stated by the court. The conclusions of law were excepted to by the appellant and a proper assignment of error.

The questions presented and discussed relate to the right of the relator to the salary alleged to be due him and his right to have a writ of mandate issue compelling the Auditor of State, the appellee, to draw his warrant on the treasurer of state in favor of the relator for the sum due him. No question is presented and discussed as to the regularity of the proceedings or as to the proper parties being before the court.

The facts found by the court show that, on the 31st day of May, 1889, the relator, John Worrell was appointed and commissioned chief of the Indiana bureau of statistics by Alvin P. Hovey, governor of the State of Indiana; that at the time of his appointment, he was a resident voter of the State, of legal age, and in every way eligible to hold the office, and on the day of his appointment he took the oath of office, which was indorsed on the back of his commission, and filed a copy thereof in the office of the secretary of state, and in every way qualified as such officer; and on the same day appellee was notified of the relator's appointment and qualification; that after the relator's appointment he applied for office room in the state capitol, to be occupied by him as the chief of the Indiana bureau of statistics, and was assigned a room for that purpose by the Auditor of State, which room was independent and removed from a room occupied by William A. Peelle, Jr., and said relator Worrell has been doing work and performing the duties as the chief of the bureau of statistics independent of work performed by said Peelle from May 31, 1889, to November 19, 1890.

NOTE.—Office and officer.

An office is a public employment conferred by the government. It embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties. Foltz v. Kerlin, 2 West. Rep. 671, 105 Ind. 221; United States v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 385, 18 L. ed. 880.

An office is the right to exercise a public function or employment, and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it. Hamlin v. Kassafer, 15 Or. 456.

A public officer is bound to perform the duties of his office for the compensation fixed by law. Barth v. Cutler (Utah) July 12, 1890, citing Evans v. Trenton, 24 N. J. L. 764; *Territory v. Officers de facto and de jure distinguished.

A person in possession of an office may be an officer de facto, while some other person may be the officer de jure, though there cannot be an officer de jure and an officer de facto both in possession at the same time. Carl v. Rhener, 27 Minn. 298; Steinback v. State, 38 Ind. 489; Cronin v. Gundy, 16 Hun. 524. See Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 423; State v. Brown, 12 Minn. 538; Wilcox v. Smith, 5 Wend. 281; *People v. An officer de facto is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law. Rex v. Bedford Level, 6 East, 356.

He is one who exercises the duties of an officer under color of an appointment or election to that office. Plymouth v. Painter, 17 Conn. 585, 44 Am. Dec. 574.

At the time relator Worrell was appointed, commissioned and qualified as chief of the Indiana bureau of statistics, said office was held and occupied, and the duties thereof were being performed, by one William A. Peelle, Jr., a person who was eligible to fill the office, who held said office under and by virtue of an election thereto by the fifty-third, fifty-fourth and fifty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Indiana, and was commissioned under said first two elections by Governors Porter and Gray, which commissions set out the elections and certified thereto; that Governor Hovey refused to issue to said Peelle a commission under the election of said Peelle to said office, by the fifty-sixth General Assembly; that Peelle claimed and had no other title to said office except as herein above found, said office being vacant except as so occupied and claimed by Peelle and Worrell.

The findings further show that Worrell demanded of Peelle possession of the office immediately after his appointment and qualification, and Peelle refused to surrender it, and that Worrell immediately commenced quo warranto proceedings against Peelle for the possession of the office, which were twice appealed to the supreme court and reversed, and were not disposed of until after the state election in 1890, at which election Peelle was duly elected to said office, and was commissioned by the governor and qualified as such officer; and on Peelle's motion, supported by proof of his election, the quo warranto proceedings were dismissed; that during all of the time Peelle continued to occupy the apartments as he had previous to Worrell's appointment, and retained the archives of the office, collected information and made records the same as he had done prior to Worrell's appointment; that the salary of the chief of the bureau of statistics is $1,800 a year, and there is money in the treasury of the State of Indiana subject to be paid out on warrants of the Auditor of State, for the payment of the salary of said chief; that relator has, prior to the commencement of this suit, demanded of the appellee that he draw a warrant in relator's favor for his salary, and since November 4, 1890, he has made demand upon the appellee that he draw such warrant for the sum of $2,550, said sum to be paid to him as salary from May 31, 1889, to November 1, 1890, and presented itemized and qualified bills therefor as required by law, and appellee has refused to draw such warrant; that on October 31, 1889, appellee drew his warrant on the treasurer of state in favor of William A. Peelle, Jr., demand having been made by said Peelle for the sum of $750 as salary, or by way of compensation as chief of the Indiana bureau of statistics from May 31, 1889, to November 1, 1889; otherwise said appellee has not drawn his warrant on the treasurer of state in favor of any person for the salary of said office.

There is a further finding in regard to the provisions of the laws appropriating the amount for the salary of such office, and a provision that it should be paid to Peelle as such chief. On the foregoing facts, the court stated as a conclusion of law that relator was not entitled to a writ of mandate as prayed in his petition.

The Act of the Legislature approved March 29, 1879, creating a state bureau of statistics, made it the duty of the bureau to collect, systematize, tabulate and present in biennial reports statistical information and details relating to agricultural, manufacturing, mining, commerce, education, labor, social and sanitary condition, vital statistics, marriages and deaths; and the permanent property of the productive industry of the people of the State. The first section of this Act provides that the department is established for the collection and dissemination

An officer de facto is not entitled to the salary attached to the office. Andrews v. Portland, 4 New Eng. Rep. 780, 79 Me. 484.

One claiming a salary must prove his legal title to the office; and an officer de facto, and not de jure, cannot maintain an action for salary. Romero v. United States, 5 L. R. A. 60, 24 Ct. Cl. 331.

Payment of salary to a de facto officer without authority is no defense against a claim, for payment by the officer de jure. Williams v. Clayton (Utah) March 8, 1889. See Andrews v. Portland, 4 New Eng. Rep. 780, 79 Me. 484.

If a de facto officer has abandoned the office, the rightful incumbent may sue for salary. Nichols v. MacLean, 2 Cent. Rep. 500, 101 N. Y. 528.

The rule against collaterally impeaching the title of an officer de facto does not apply when the officer himself seeks to recover compensation. Phelon v. Granville, 1 New Eng. Officer de jure entitled to the salary.

Where an officer is in possession of an office de facto, the officer de jure is the one who has the lawful right to the office; and who has either been ousted or has never taken possession. Hamlin v. Kassafer, 15 Or. 466.

of information hereafter provided, by biennial printed reports to the governor and Legislature of the State, and it provides for the appointment of the chief by the governor. Acts 1879, p. 198.

Some amendments have been made to this Act by an Act passed in 1888. Elliott's Supp. § 1852. An attempt was made to change the method of selecting the chief and provide for his election by the General Assembly; and by an Act in 1889 (Elliott's Supplement, §§ 1854 to 1862, inclusive), some additional duties were added, and it was made the duty of the chief to transmit one copy of the biennial report to each county and state officer. The duty of the bureau is to gather such information as is required by the law, systematize it and publish it in proper printed reports, and to disseminate such information by printed reports of all such information collected and distribute them to the Governor of the State, the General Assembly and to each state and county officer of the State. There is no law providing that any public records shall be kept of such information save the printed reports. The benefit to be derived on account of such a bureau is through the publication and distribution of the biennial reports. It is provided that head-quarters for the bureau shall be furnished by the State.

The findings of fact show that the relator Worrell had been assigned and provided office rooms by the Auditor of State in the state house. There was nothing to prevent him from discharging the duties of the office, collecting and systematizing the information contemplated by the law and publishing the same in printed reports, and distributing them with the same efficiency and to the same extent as if Peelle had surrendered the apartments occupied by him previous to that time, and the findings of fact show that Worrell did discharge the duties of the office in compliance with the law. It is true, there is a finding that Peelle was in possession of the archives and records of the office. What the archives and records were that he was in possession of the findings do not show. The law makes no provision whereby such officer is required to keep any public records or anything else to be kept in connection with, and belonging to the office, there to remain as the property of the State, which the outgoing officer would be required to turn over to his successor. The findings of fact show that Worrell was eligible to the office; that he was duly appointed, commissioned and qualified as such officer; that the appellee, the Auditor of the State, had notice at the time of his appointment and qualification; that he made application to the Auditor of State for apartments and the Auditor of State assigned him apartments for head-quarters of the bureau; and that he occupied them and discharged the duties of the office. It is further found that Peelle retained the apartments formerly occupied by him, and continued to act, or assumed to act, as chief, and collect information the same as he had done before; but the findings show that he had no title to such office except through a pretended election by 18 L. R. A.

the General Assembly. In the adjudication in the quo warranto proceedings, the main question in this case was settled by the decisions of this court on appeal. State v. Peelle, 121 Ind. 495, and State v. Peelle, 124 Ind. 515, 8 L. R. A. 228.

By these decisions between these same parties, the law was settled that the statute authorizing the election of a chief of the bureau of statistics by the General Assembly was unconstitutional and void, and that the election and commission of Peelle gave to him no title to the office, and that the governor was authorized to appoint to fill the vacancy until the office was filled by an election. Under these decisions, the facts found in this case show that Worrell was, during the time from his appointment and qualification up to the date of the election and qualification of Peelle as his successor, the de jure officer; not only the de jure officer, but in possession of and discharging the duties of the office. When he was appointed by the governor and qualified, he became the de jure officer; and when he was assigned quarters by the Auditor of State in the state capitol to occupy as head quarters for the bureau and discharge the duties of the office, he was equipped in full to discharge all the duties incident to the office, and he did discharge the duties from thenceforward until his successor was elected and qualified. Being a de jure officer and in possession of and discharging the duties of the office, under all authorities, he is entitled to the salary. Indeed, the later and better reasoned cases hold that the salary is an incident to the office, and belongs by law to the person holding the legal title to the office, and that he can sue and recover it regardless of the fact, whether he is occupying and discharging the duties of the office or not, if he is willing to do so; but is kept out by another, who is claiming to act as an officer de facto. This would seem to be the true theory; though it is not necessary to go to that extent in this case, as, under the facts found, Worrell was not only the de jure officer, but was in fact in possession and discharging the duties of the office during the time for which he claims salary. It is true, the State and the public are interested in having a public office filled; and when one holds an office though without title, and acts as an officer de facto, and keeps out the de jure officer, and while so in possession discharges the duties of the office, the public good demands that the acts of such de facto officer, in so far as they affect third parties or the public, be declared valid; but there is no valid reason for declaring that, as between the de jure and de facto officer, the de facto officer is entitled to the salary; or that he, by excluding the de jure officer, can prevent him from recovering the salary; or for holding that when one charged with the duty of paying the salary when, with knowledge of all the facts, he pays to the de facto officer, he shall be released from paying to the de jure officer, the disbursing officer cannot be sued or compelled to pay a de facto officer. When the de facto officer sues for his salary he brings in question the title to the office, and he cannot recover without establishing his legal right and title to the office. To hold that a payment by a distributing officer to a de facto officer exonerates him from liability to the de jure officer for the salary, but stimulates irresponsible persons to cling to an office without even a shadow of title, and exclude the lawful occupant with a view of recovering the salary of the lawful occupant to the office; but under the facts in this case, we are not required to go to the extent of holding that the de jure officer out of possession can recover his salary notwithstanding another is occupying and discharging the duties of the office as an officer de facto; for in this case the facts found show Worrell to have been an officer de jure in possession of the apartments assigned to him by the proper officer, the Auditor of State, and discharging the duties of the office so that the headquarters of the bureau of statistics of the State of Indiana were, both in law and in fact, in the apartment in the capitol building set apart for occupancy by Worrell, the legally appointed, commissioned and qualified chief of the bureau of statistics; and, as it seems to us, it would be a travesty on justice to hold that Worrell, under such a state of facts, could be deprived from recovering his salary, or that the Auditor of State could refuse to draw a warrant, or the treasurer of state refuse to pay a warrant for his salary; notwithstanding Worrell is the lawful officer in possession, but on account of Peelle continuing to occupy rooms theretofore occupied by him, and to gather statistics; after it was held by the Supreme Court of Indiana that the law under which Peelle claims to have been elected is unconstitutional and void, and the commissions issued in pursuance of such elections gave him no title to the office. Indeed, the facts found show that Peelle terminated the quo warranto proceedings by abandoning any claim to the office by virtue of his pretended election by the General Assembly, and set up his title to the office by virtue of his election by the people and his commission and qualification thereunder; dismissing the case upon the grounds that, after his election and qualification he was the legal chief of statistics, and no judgment of ouster could be rendered against him.

The appellee had full knowledge of Worrell's appointment and qualification; he assigned him apartments to occupy as such officer; he knew that he was in possession of the office, as he had assigned him the apartments in the state capitol which he occupied.

Worrell is entitled to recover the full amount of his salary, and to have a warrant drawn on the treasury by the Auditor of State for the amount, unless the provision of the law naming Peelle as the chief to whom the salary is to be paid prohibits the payment to the legal officer; and this we will now consider.

As we have seen, Peelle was not the legal officer, and Worrell was the legal officer in possession of the office, discharging the duties of the office. The proposition contended for is that, notwithstanding Worrell was the legally appointed and qualified officer discharging the duties of the office, for which a salary is fixed, and to which the legally qualified officer is entitled as an incident to the office, that the Legislature can make an appropriation to pay the salary which Worrell has earned, and to which he is entitled, and without any legal authority to do so, name Peelle as such officer, chief of the bureau of statistics, and appropriate an amount to pay the salary of the chief and provide it should be paid to Peelle and none other; and such a clause in a law would be valid, providing for the payment to Peelle the salary earned by and due to Worrell. The statement of the proposition carries with it the fallacy of it. That such a provision is invalid seems too clear to admit of discussion. It is directly appropriating a salary due to one and which is the property of one for the benefit of another.

By an Act of the General Assembly approved March 11, 1889, there is appropriated "for all of the expenses of the bureau of statistics authorized by law, including the salary of the chief of said bureau, of all assistants, all traveling and office expenses, including all blanks, stationery and postage to be paid out on the itemized and qualified bills of the chief of the bureau of statistics $11,000; for the year ending October 31, 1889, the sum of $4,000." Stopping with this provision of the law, no complications could arise. It expressly provides that the several sums shall be paid out "on the itemized and qualified bills of the chief;" but there follows, in a separate clause of the Act, a provision in the law providing that "the several sums so appropriated by this Act for said bureau of statistics shall be paid to William A. Peelle, Jr., chief of said bureau, elected by this General Assembly, or to his successor in office appointed pursuant to an Act of the General Assembly in case of the death, removal from the State or resignation of said William A. Peelle, Jr., and to no other person or persons."

It is evident that this provision was inserted in the law, not with a view of paying the salary to Peelle regardless of the fact as to whether he was the legal chief of the bureau or not, for the appropriation is made with a provision that it shall be paid out on the itemized account of the chief. The clause relating to Peelle evidently was inserted upon the theory that he was the legal officer. Certainly, no legislative body would so far forget their duties and obligations to the State as to endeavor to elect an officer without authority of law, and endeavor to forestall any effort on behalf of the legally elected officer to recover the office or discharge its duties by placing the appropriation in such condition as that the salary belonging to the legal officer, and incidental expenses of the office could not be recovered by the legally elected or appointed and qualified officer. To hold that the General Assembly intended to provide that the person chosen by the General Assembly shall have the office, right or wrong, and shall receive the salary, or, at least, that no other person, though legally entitled thereto, shall receive the salary or draw the sum so appropriated for running such office and department of the government would be attributing improper motives to its members. Courts should not impugn the motives of legislators, and it would be impugning their motives to hold that they intended by the provisions of this law to declare the person the General Assembly elected to this office should have the salary and draw the amount appropriated, though the election is illegal and he may have no right to the salary or the money, notwithstanding another has been lawfully elected or appointed and qualified and become the lawful chief of said bureau. Certainly such was not the intention of the Legislature, and the act would be absolutely void if it was. The legislative department has the right, and it is its duty, to make appropriations for the payment of salaries and the expense of running the various departments of the state government. Whether salaries might not in some instances be recovered without an appropriation it is not necessary to decide; but it is certain that there is no authority to go through the formality of electing an officer to an office then in existence, though the election be void, and appropriating funds to pay the salary of the legal officer, and providing that such sum shall be paid to the officer having no title to the office. To enunciate such a doctrine would be to hold that the Legislature might convene and choose persons to fill all of the state offices, and appropriate money to pay the salary of the legal officer, and then declare that in such instance it shall be paid to the person so chosen by the Legislature to fill such office, and to none other.

The Constitution provides that no person charged with official duties under one department of State shall exercise any of the functions of another. Art. 3, § 1.

The part of the law making an appropriation to pay the salary of the chief and to pay the expenses of the bureau is the exercise of a legislative function; but that portion which declares that the said sum shall be paid to Peelle is an attempt to exercise judicial powers by declaring who is the legal chief of the bureau of statistics and entitled to the salary, and such provision is absolutely void. There is a like provision in the law relating to other officers in charge of state institutions. Sec. 4 of the Act—Elliott's Supp. § 2239—provides that "if the Auditor of State shall draw his warrant for any of the sums herein named when the person to whom the same are payable are designated or named herein; or if the treasurer of state shall pay any of said sums, or any part thereof except to such persons herein named, he shall be guilty of a felony," etc.

What we have said in regard to the provision of the law relating to the naming of Peelle as the person to whom the amount shall be paid is equally applicable to this. It is, in effect, in the first instance, an attempted adjudication as to who the legal officers are, and then an effort to enforce the judgment by providing a penalty for disobeying it. The legal officers are entitled to their salaries and money appropriated for conducting a department of state or a public institution should be drawn by the officer legally entitled to receive it; and not by any certain person regardless of whether he has been legally elected or is in possession of the office or not; and it is not within the province of the Legislature to declare in an appropriation bill who are or who are not the legally elected officers of any department. They probably may provide against the paying out of the money to any person other than the legally qualified and acting officer or officers, and subject the officer to a penalty for paying the same to any other than such officer or officers; but it cannot adjudicate as to who are the legal officers, and provide that payment shall be made to them and none other.

The conclusion we have reached is well supported by the most recent and well-reasoned cases; although there is still some irreconcilable conflict in the authorities, particularly in the earlier cases.

In Andrus v. Portland, 79 Me. 484, 10 Am. St. Rep. 280, it was held that a de jure officer might recover his full salary from the city notwithstanding another had been in possession of the office and kept the de jure officer out, and the salary had been paid to the person acting as an officer de facto; the city having notice that the officer de jure claimed he was illegally deprived of the office, that the city was not entitled to credit for what the de facto officer earned by his personal services. In that case the court says: "A de facto officer has no legal right to the emoluments of the office, the duties of which he performed under color of an appointment, but without legal title. He cannot maintain an action for the salary. His action puts in issue his legal title to the office and he cannot recover by showing merely that he was an officer de facto. In Nichols v. MacLean, 101 N. Y. 526, 2 Cent. Rep. 500, 54 Am. Rep. 730, the court says: 'It is abundantly settled by authority that an officer de facto can, as a general rule, assert no right of property, and that his acts are void as to himself, unless he is also an officer de jure.' In Harris v. Jays, Cro. Eliz. 699, the doctrine is tersely stated as follows: 'The act of an officer de facto when it is for his own benefit is void, because he shall not take advantage of his own want of title which he must be cognizant of; but when it is for the benefit of strangers or the public, who are presumed to be ignorant of such defect of title, it is good.'

In a note by the Hon. A. C. Freeman to this case, in the American State Reports, in speaking of the cases holding that the payment to the de facto officer is a good defense to an action by the de jure officer, he says: "These decisions have been placed partly upon the ground that the officer de jure had no property rights in the office, and partly upon the ground that this right to the salary or emoluments of his office was not dependent upon the office, but upon the actual performance of his services as a public official; and further, that while there was an officer de facto in actual possession of the office, the disbursing officers were not entitled to consider the question of who ought to be in such possession; nor to question the title in any other way than by a proceeding in quo warranto. It is believed that none of these grounds are well taken; and most courts which yet maintain the general rule have substantially admitted in subsequent cases that the grounds for it did not in fact exist. In the first place, it is now well settled that an officer de facto is not entitled to the salary of the office, and that although he may faithfully discharge its duties, he cannot maintain any action against the city or county for the compensation to which he would be entitled if he were an officer de jure.

In the next place, if he has in fact received the emoluments of the office, he has no right whatever to retain them, and he may be compelled to account therefor to the officer de jure in any appropriate form of action.

If a judgment of ouster has been entered against an officer de facto, and salary is thereafter paid to him, the officer de jure may maintain an action therefor against the city or county notwithstanding such payment.

If no part of the salary has been paid during the incumbency of an officer de facto, the officer de jure, although he performed none of the duties of the office, may maintain an action against the city and county for the salary and emoluments thereof." Mr. Freeman concludes by saying: "Hence the principal case and cases in California and Tennessee maintain the doctrine against the weight of authority, but in harmony, we think, with judicial principle, that the payment of the salary to an officer de facto in no way impairs the right of the officer de jure to recover such salary from the city, county or other public body charged with the duty of making its payment."

Numerous authorities are cited in support of the doctrine as stated by Mr. Freeman, and we think it lays down the proper rule. See also People v. Smyth, 28 Cal. 21; Carroll v. Siebenthaler, 37 Cal. 193; People v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44; Memphis v. Woodward, 12 Heisk. 499; Matthews v. Copiah County 'Supra. 53 Miss. 715; McCue v. Wapello County, 56 Iowa, 698; Glascok v. Lyons, 20 Ind. 1; Douglass v. State, 81 Ind. 429.

Judge Cooley, in a very able dissenting opinion in the case of Auditors of Wayne County v. Benoit, 20 Mich. 176, holds that the payment of salary to a de facto officer is not a defense to an action by the de jure officer, and this is in harmony with all general principles of the law. The de jure officer is entitled to the possession and emoluments of the office, and he is unlawfully kept out of it by an intruder. It is inconsistent with all principles of justice and equity that such intruder and unlawful occupant shall have the emoluments for the length of time he can continue in possession, or that the person from whom the salary is due, when he has knowledge of the facts, can set up as a defense the fact that a de facto officer is in possession of the office and depriving the de jure officer of the possession of the office; though, as we have heretofore stated, it is unnecessary to go to this extent in this case; as Worrell, in addition to being a de jure officer, was occupying apartments set apart to him by the State, and was discharging the duties of the office as well and as fully as he could in any other place, so that he was both a de jure and de facto officer. As regards this case, there was an appropriation made to pay the salary of the chief of the bureau of statistics; that money is in the treasury. The only method by which Worrell, who is such de jure officer, can recover his salary is by a proceeding in mandate compelling the Auditor of State to draw a warrant on the treasurer for the amount. The Auditor refused to draw his warrant and Worrell instituted this suit. The facts found show the money in the treasury; that Worrell is the de jure officer; that immediately upon his qualification he was assigned quarters by the Auditor of State; that he has discharged the duties of the office. The only possible or pretended defense urged is that Peelle, who had been acting as a de facto chief prior to Worrell's appointment, continued to occupy the apartments which he had theretofore occupied, and to gather statistics and do as he had before done, not having any title to the office, and that the appellee had, with full knowledge of all the facts, paid to Peelle $750 of salary. These facts constitute no defense to Worrell's action for mandamus to compel the payment of his salary. Worrell was entitled to his mandate, and the circuit court erred in its conclusions of law.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the court below to restate its conclusions of law stating that Worrell is entitled to a mandate as prayed for for the full amount of salary due him, $2,550; and to render judgment accordingly.

Elliott, J.:

I concur in the conclusion reached in the opinion of the court solely upon the ground that the controversy as to the particular office in dispute is settled by the prevailing opinion delivered in the cases between the claimants to the office on former appeals. Accepting those decisions as the law of the particular controversy, as the court is bound to do, it must follow that Worrell is the rightful officer; and that, as the rightful officer, he is entitled to the compensation attached to the office. The case, in the form it has assumed, is unique; and cannot, as I suppose, be deemed a precedent justifying the inference that a state disbursing or distributing officer must, at his peril, decide a controversy between rival claimants to a public office. This I say because the doctrine of the prevailing opinions on former appeals is that Peelle did not have and could not have, any title to the office; and upon these decisions the Auditor of State could have acted without incurring any risk; inasmuch as the entire controversy as to the right to the office concerned matters of law, and not of fact. In saying this I do not mean to be understood as receding from the opinions heretofore expressed upon the principal question; for I here simply yield to the doctrine declared by the court in its former decisions.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Tennessee.

(....Tenn.....)

1. An Act requiring a voter to place a mark opposite the name of each candidate voted for by him does not conflict with Tenn. Const., art. 4, § 1, as imposing the requirement of education on the part of the voter in addition to the constitutional requirements.
2. Act March 11, 1890, to provide for purity of elections, is not in conflict with Tenn. Const., art. 11, § 8, as class legislation, because it applies only to counties of 70,000 and cities of 9,000 population.
3. An Act to provide for the purity of elections, which does not prevent an elector from casting his vote fairly, does not interfere with the privileges and immunities of the citizens so as to conflict with U. S. Const., Amend. 14.
4. The commissioners and registrars of election which Tenn. Act March 11, 1890, provides shall be appointed by the governor and the commissioners respectively, are not county officers within Tenn. Const., art. 11, § 17, providing that no county office shall be filled otherwise than by the people or the county court.

ERROR to the Criminal Court for Shelby County to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the provisions of a statute designed to secure the purity of elections. Affirmed.

The Act in question passed March 11, 1890, chap. 24, provided a system of election whereby the names of all candidates should be printed on one ticket and the voter should make a cross-mark opposite the name of the candidate voted for, while in a compartment closed from the view of other voters. In providing for the registration of voters the Statute provides that three commissioners of registration shall be appointed by the governor for each county, and that registrars of election shall be appointed by such commissioners.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. L. B. Eaton and Charles Eaton for plaintiff in error.

Mr. George W. Pickle, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Turney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error was indicted for removing ballots, aiding electors in making their ballots, instructing them how to vote, etc., was convicted, and has appealed. His defense is the unconstitutionality of the Act of the Legislature passed March 11, 1890, chap. 24, entitled "An Act to Provide more Stringent Regulations for Securing the Purity of Elections in this State, and Applicable to Counties Having a Population of over Seventy Thousand," and cities of over nine thousand, inhabitants, computed by the census of 1880, or which may hereafter have such numbers by any subsequent federal census, 18 L. R. A.

etc. The attack is mainly on the grounds that the Act violates art. 4, § 1, and art. 11, § 17, of the Constitution; it being argued that under the first ordinance there can be no restriction or qualification of the right to vote, except the condition of the payment of a poll-tax, and that the law in question requires an educational qualification, in that it imposes upon the elector the duty of being able to select for himself the name or names of the candidates for whom he desires to vote. If these requirements violate the letter or spirit of art. 4, § 1, the law is a nullity. To determine this the section must be construed as a whole. The provisions that every male citizen of the age of twenty-one, etc., shall be entitled to vote; that there shall be no qualification attached to the right of suffrage, except that each voter shall have paid his poll-tax; that the General Assembly may enact laws to secure the freedom of elections and the purity of the ballot-box,—must consist together.

The proposition that the Statute before us adds to these qualifications that of education is comprehensive, and involves more or less refinement of the term "educational." "Education" is a broad term, and includes all knowledge, if we take it in its full, and not in its legal or popular, sense. Whatever we learn by observation, by conversation, or by other means, away from what has been implanted by nature, is education. In fact, everything not known intuitively and instinctively is education, but not in the sense we must understand the objection to this Act. The convention of 1870, in a spirit of conservatism appropriate to the times, prepared and presented the Constitution, which was adopted by the people. That Constitution gives, as we have seen, the elective franchise, with the qualifications named. It is certain that, at that time, there was much misgiving and apprehension as to the future of the State, and all felt the necessity of such constitutional provisions as would, if rightly construed, preserve in its integrity a republican form of government for the State. It is evident the framers of the Constitution did not intend, by its conference of the right to vote, to ignore an educational qualification in all respects. It fixes the age at twenty-one, with a citizenship of the United States, and twelve months' residence in the State, and six months' in the county. The age was fixed as one of maturity, at which period the law presumed the proposed voter to have sufficiently ripened in mental power to determine for himself the soundness or unsoundness of the measure upon which he is called to vote. Citizenship of the United States is a prerequisite, as fixing such interest in the welfare of the federal government as supposes a study of and acquaintance with its governmental policy, and so is a residence in the State and county, as well as to become acquainted with the character and capacity of the men who might ask office. These restrictions are terms of educational probation. A foreigner, if in the United States, and in any State and county, for any number of years, however long, before becoming naturalized, must still reside in the county six months after naturalization before he is entitled to vote. State v. Clokey, 5 Sneed, 486. A native citizen or resident of any county cannot remove to another, however short the distance of removal, and be entitled to vote in the latter, until he shall have been a resident citizen thereof for the period of six months. All this is to acquaint and identify him with the wants and interests of the people with whom he proposes to live.

It is, from these clearly-defined constitutional requirements, manifest that the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate an indiscriminate and ignorant exercise of the elective franchise, but guarded against it as far as they could then see it. Having done this, they naturally concluded the future might develop mischiefs that would not fall within the defined guards, and, to make sure of protection in such emergencies, they granted to the General Assembly the power to enact laws to secure the freedom of elections and the purity of the ballot box. The purpose of the law before us is to require the voter to cast his own ballot; to do away, as far as possible, with the illegal practice of voting oftener than once, existing in some quarters of the State; and to defeat bribery, duress and corruption at the polls. The law is plain and simple in its provisions. Every voter, however illiterate, can always find a friend to himself, or some one candidate, who will read and explain the law and the manner of its observance. Ballots and cards of instruction are always at hand. The names of the candidates are printed, and with little effort the unlettered voter can soon become as well acquainted with the printed name of his candidate as with his face, and with easy readiness place his cross (X) opposite that name, and fold his ticket as required. The argument of inconvenience is as nothing compared to the rights intended to be protected by that inconvenience, and the pulling, pushing, and bribery of ignorant men before and at elections. The inconvenience to a part of the community must yield to the good of the whole. The law presumes the voter expresses the choice of his judgment by his ballot. No man, learned or unlearned, can have a choice without being first informed. If, then, information is required as to any part of the right and duty of voting, why not as to all? The Constitution surrounded the right of suffrage with some inconveniences, and authorized the Legislature to attach more. In the exercise of its power, the Legislature must be reasonable and just, not imposing impossible or oppressive conditions, else its legislation will be void.

That the law applies only to counties of 70,000 and cities of 9,000 inhabitants does not impeach its validity.* All counties and cities that have or may hereafter have the designated population are embraced. It applies to all parts of the State, and each county and city may come within its provision. This principle has often been applied by this court, holding that similar legislation was not class. The Statute in nowise infracts the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Article 4, § 4, of the instrument, guarantees to every State in the Union a republican form of government. No government can be republican that fails to secure the purity of elections. By these terms of the United States Constitution the Legislature of each State has the organic authority for the passage of such laws as will secure that purity, and it cannot be urged that such laws abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens. In the matter of voting, the only privilege one has is to cast his vote fairly, and not interfere with others by fraud, force, or duress. His privileges are personal. Whatever may be necessary to carry out the sections of the two Constitutions cited is within the power of the Legislature for adoption. It may employ every legislative means, however vigorous, to accomplish the ends contemplated by the framers of the constitutions. The Legislatures are, as a rule, the judges of the measures to be adopted, and their necessity. The power to regulate and reform is theirs. They are presumed to know the condition and wants of the State.

The commissioners and registrars named in the Act are not county officers, in contemplation of art. 11, § 17, of the Constitution, which ordains: "No county office created by the Legislature shall be filled otherwise than by the people or the county court." They merely constitute the machinery by which the law is operated. They are more in the nature of judges or inspectors of elections. In speaking of the statutes requiring the county court to make appointments of judges of elections, Judge Milligan said: "This provision of the Statute, we apprehend, is merely directory, and whether the appointment is made by the county court, by the sheriff, or coroner, as the case may be, by and with the advice of three justices, or an equal or less number of justices or respectable freeholders, the result is the same. The object of the Statute is to secure just and competent inspectors, and when that end is attained, without prejudice to the contestant, it constitutes no ground for declaring the election void. Were the law held otherwise, and a strict conformity in all respects to its letter exacted of every officer holding popular elections, it would result in interminable contests about unsubstantial formalities, and end in the practical denial of the right of the people to choose their own officers." McCraw v. Harralson, 4 Coldw. 42. The officers recognized by this Act being so nearly akin to and closely associated with those of judges and inspectors of elections, the holding of Judge Milligan applies with full force. Such officers had three sources of appointment, and none of election, and therefore were not county officers, in the sense of the provision of the Constitution. We so hold as to the officers mentioned by this Act.

*Const., art. 11, § 8, provides that the Legislature shall not pass any law granting to any individuals "rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, other than such as may be, by the same law, extended to any member of the community who may be able to bring himself within the provisions of such law."

The judgment of the Criminal Court, holding the Act to be constitutional, is affirmed.

v.

Leopold LAWO.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A train propelled by a small engine called a "dummy," although exclusively engaged in carrying passengers, whether run within or without the limits of a municipality, is a "railroad" train within the meaning of a statute prescribing regulations to be observed by railroads for the avoidance of accidents.
2. An ordinance prohibiting railroad steam whistles to be blown in a city is a nullity so far as it conflicts with the general law of the State requiring whistles to be blown as signals to persons on the track.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's failure to comply with the statutory requirements as to precautions for the avoidance of accidents. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gantt & Patterson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. G. Brown and Bolton Smith, for defendant in error:

The presumption is not lightly to be indulged that the Legislature has by implication repealed, as respects a particular municipality, or as respects all municipalities, laws of a general nature elsewhere in force throughout the State.

Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 88. See also Seibold v. People, 86 Ill. 38.

A municipal corporation can pass no ordinance which conflicts with any general statute in force.

Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 829.

The grant of power to the taxing district of Shelby County to "permit and regulate the passage of cars" is in reality nothing more than authority to further regulate such matters by imposing such additional restrictions upon railroads as the greater danger of passage through a thickly populated district calls for.

Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 287; State v. Welch, 36 Conn. 215.

It is utterly impossible to operate a dummy line without greatly obstructing and rendering more dangerous other business and travel usually seen and always allowable on a public highway.

Street R. Co. v. Doyle, 88 Tenn. 750.

Where a road is operated by steam and by the general public also, the two uses are almost, if not wholly, inconsistent with each other, so that taking the highway for a railroad will nearly supersede the former use to which it had been legally appropriated.

Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 65.

Following out the reasoning in the Doyle Case, the statutory precautions required of the commercial railways for the protection of the life and property of the citizen are equally demanded of a dummy line.

Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By a collision on one of the streets of Memphis, between a wagon driven by Lawo and a dummy train of street-cars, he sustained such bodily injuries as have resulted in judgment for $3,000 against plaintiff in error, who, as receiver, was operating the railway at the time. The circuit judge charged the jury that the statutory precautions required to be observed by railroads, and contained in subsection 4, § 1298, Tenn. Code (Mill. & V.), applied to the movement of all railway trains upon the streets of Memphis, and that a dummy line was a "railroad" within the meaning of this provis-

NOTE.—Statutory provisions to prevent accidents on railroads.

In proportion to the danger must be the degree of diligence to which railroad companies are held in the protection and preservation of human life in operating their roads. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Connor, 9 Heisk. 20.

The statute makes no exception and tolerates no excuses; its language is "every railroad company." Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 5 Heisk. 266; Columbia v. East Tennessee & V. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 843.

It should be rigidly short of requiring absolute impossibilities. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Scales, 2 Lea, 693.

For if any obstruction appears on the road so suddenly that it is impossible to comply with all the statutory requirements after it could and ought to have been seen by the lookout, the company will not be liable. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Swaney, 5 Lea, 119, 128; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Scales, 2 Lea, 688; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stone, 7 Heisk. 471.

But if there was sufficient time after it ought to have been seen by the lookout, the company will be liable. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. White, 13 L. R. A.

5 Lea, 840; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 5 Heisk. 266; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Connor, 9 Heisk. 20; Hill v. Louisville & N. R. Co. Id. 827.

An engineer has no right to presume that a man upon the track will step off on the approach of a train, but he should give the alarm the instant he sees him on the track. Hill v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 823.

Ordinance cannot conflict with state law.

A municipal ordinance which conflicts with a state law on the same subject is void. Rule applied as to various subjects. See New York v. Nichols, 4 Hill, 206; Thompson v. Mt. Vernon, 11 Ohio St. 688; Adams v. Albany, 29 Ga. 56; Sill v. Corning, 15 N. Y. 297; Cincinnati v. Gwynne, 10 Ohio, 190; Wood v. Brooklyn, 14 Barb. 426; Markle v. Akron, 14 Ohio, 586; Thomas v. Richmond, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 349, 20 L. ed. 453.

Yet a corporation may, in some cases, consistently with general law, further regulate by ordinance subjects already regulated by statute. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 376, citing Huddleson v. Ruffin, 6 Ohio St. 604; Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237; State v. Welch, 36 Conn. 215.

ion. Each of these propositions has been assigned as error. Counsel have urged very forcibly that when, by legislative and municipal consent, a railroad has been laid longitudinally upon the streets of a city, it is not practicable to observe the requirements of the statute in reference to stopping the train whenever any person, animal, or other obstruction appears on the road; that, under such circumstances, a railway is lawfully upon the street; and that to construe the statute as applicable when thus upon the streets, will prevent any movement of trains, inasmuch as at all times persons, animals or other obstructions will be upon the road, and within observation of the lookout upon the locomotive. The statute was enacted for the purpose of preventing accidents. It prescribes precautions which, so far as they relate to the duty of watching the track, and the duty of avoiding collision with persons or animals on the track, are identical with the common-law duty of diligence. Tipton v. Railroad Co. 90 Tenn. —; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Pratt, 85 Tenn. 18.

If these precautions are observed the Statute relieves the company of responsibility. If it fails to observe them, the statute imposes liability. All other questions out of the way, the rule would be the same, regardless of the Statute. With respect to the burden of proof, and the effect of contributory negligence, the Statute changes the rule of common law. If there be any strength in this argument, it would practically repeal the Statute, for the same difficulty in literally observing it will be found to exist between country stations, the track in the daytime being very generally used as a walkway. Practically, it is unnecessary to stop the train when an object appears on the track, save in a very few instances. The Statute only requires it when necessary, and experience demonstrates that this necessity seldom arises. The track is generally cleared by signals, and no liability arises from failure to stop, unless such failure has resulted in an accident. What the common law would impose as ordinary care, when necessary to avoid injury to the property of another, or an accident to a person upon the track, is not so difficult of accomplishment, when embodied in legislation, as to authorize a construction suspending it when the necessity for its observance is most necessary.

When a railroad is longitudinally upon the street of a city, the danger of accidents is obviously increased. Under such circumstances, there should be a corresponding increase of diligence. The railway is upon the street of its own volition. The economical acquisition of the right of way has been regarded as of greater benefit than the dangers incident to a road so placed. But the use of the street by the railway is not exclusive. The public have equal rights. To say that, under such circumstances, the Statute should be held inoperative, would be to say that the Legislature intended that it should not apply just where the probability of accidents is greatest. It will doubtless be found necessary, where a road is upon the street of a city, to so regulate the speed that the train can be stopped within a short distance, in case of necessity. A train pulled by a small engine called a "dummy," although exclusively engaged in carrying passengers, is a "railroad," within the meaning of the Statute prescribing precautions to be observed by railroads. The evil intended to be remedied pertains as much to this sort of railway as to the ordinary railroad of commerce.

In the case of Street R. Co. v. Doyle, 88 Tenn. 747, we had occasion to consider the resemblance and difference between the dummy line and the commercial railway. For the reason then stated, we think the statutory precautions against railroad accidents apply to dummy lines, whether run within or without the limits of a municipality.

The third assignment of error is for the refusal of the court to charge the jury that, under the ordinances of the City of Memphis, the blowing of a whistle by a railway engine was a misdemeanor, and that, therefore, the statutory precaution of blowing the whistle when a person or animal appeared on the road, need not be observed within the city limits. There was no error in this. By the Act creating the present government, in force in the City of Memphis, power was given the municipality "to permit and regulate the laying of railroad tracks of iron, and the passage of railroad cars through the taxing district, and to remove such railroad track if it obstructs travel, or does not conform to the laws of the taxing district; and to make all suitable and proper regulations in regard to the use of the streets for street-cars, and to regulate the running of the same, so as to prevent injury or inconvenience to the public." Acts 1879, chap. 84, p. 100. Under this authority the municipality has enacted an ordinance regulating the running of trains through the city. It seems wise and salutary in the main. Among other things prohibited is the blowing of the steam-whistle. In place of this, the bell is required to be rung, and watchmen are required to be stationed at street crossings. The ordinances of this municipality are of no authority where they conflict with the general law of the State. So far as this ordinance conflicts with Code (Mill. & V.), § 1298, prescribing precautions against accidents, this ordinance is a nullity. The authority given in the Act creating the taxing district, and which we have quoted, gives no authority to suspend, alter or change the general statutes of the State regulating the running of railroad trains. To support the contention of counsel as to this last request, we have been referred to Patterson on Railway Accident Law. This author does say, concerning statutory signals, that, "of course, the railway may excuse its non-performance of the statutory duty by showing that the duty was, on this particular occasion, omitted within the bounds of a municipality whose ordinances, lawfully enacted, forbade the giving of signals within its limits." § 163. The author cites the case of Pennsylvania Co. v. Hensil, 70 Ind. 569. This case seems to support the text. But, on looking to the Code of Indiana regulating the giving of signals at road crossings, it is found that the Act provides "that nothing therein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with any ordinance or by-law that has been or may be passed by any city or town, regulating the management or running of engines or trains within such city or town." Ind.

Code 1881, § 2178. We have no such exception made in our Statute. The other request refused had been substantially given, and the fifth assignment is overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

(....Cal....)

1. A vendor who, in accordance with the contract of sale, retains title to the property until the purchase-money notes are paid, has a lien on the property for a security of the debt, within the meaning of a statute forbidding an attachment where the debt is secured by mortgage or lien.

2. The assignee of a note given on the purchase of land by contract which leaves the title in the vendor until the note is paid is entitled to the benefit of the vendor's lien and cannot attach the land as a creditor without security.

*A decision was reached in this case and an opinion handed down on July 28, 1890, affirming the order of the superior court. A rehearing was subsequently granted and the court afterwards reached the conclusion stated in the opinion given herewith. [Rep.]

NOTE.—Vendor's Lien.

The grantor's lien exists in several of the States: Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 398, 402, 2 L. ed. 163, 164; White v. Williams, 1 Paige, 502, 2 L. ed. 731; *Fish v. Alabama: Foster v. Trustees of the Athenæum, 3 Ala. 302.

It may be enforced although the debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations. See Finn v. Barber, 61 Ala. 590; Bizzell v. Nix, 60 Ala. 281; Chapman v. Lee, 64 Ala. 433; Shorter v. Frazer, 64 Ala. 74. But see Linthicum v. Tapscott, 28 Ark. 237.

California: Where in a deed conveying land there was a reservation in express terms to grantor of a lien to secure the payment of a note given for part of the purchase price, such lien is more than a vendor's lien; it is an equitable mortgage which passes with the assignment of the promissory note. Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 467.

Georgia: Marine & F. Ins. Bank v. Early, R. M. Charl't. 279.

It will be enforced where a note had been given for the unpaid purchase money on which a judgment at law had been first obtained by the vendor 13 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County refusing to dissolve an attachment which was alleged to be illegal because the debt sought to be collected was secured by lien. Reversed.

Section 537, Code Civ. Proc., provides that in an action on a contract for the payment of money, plaintiff may have the property of defendant attached, unless the debt is secured by mortgage or lien.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Winslow P. Hyatt for appellant.

Messrs. Del Valle & Munday for respondent.

Paterson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to dissolve an attachment. The motion was made on the ground that the note upon which the action was brought was given to Webster, plaintiff's assignor, in part payment for certain land purchased from him by defendant; that Webster had a vendor's lien as security for the payment of the note; that the lien passed to plaintiff before filing his bill. Ford v. Smith, 1 McArth. 596; Ten Eick v. Stimpson, 1 Sandf. Ch. 247, 7 L. ed. 316. Ohio: Williams v. Roberts, 5 Ohio, 35; Mayham v. Coombs, 14 Ohio, 428; Follett v. Reese, 20 Ohio, 546. Virginia: Graves v. McCall, 1 Call, 414; Hundley v. Lyons, 5 Muntf. 342.

North Carolina: Henderson v. Stewart, 4 Hawkes, 256; Howlett v. Thompson, 1 Ired. Eq. 399.

Effect of taking note.

Taking vendee's note does not discharge the lien. Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige, 30, 2 L. ed. 549.

It is not waived or destroyed by giving a receipt in full for the purchase price, or by a recital to that effect in the deed, nor by the grantee giving his own personal security—bond, note, or bill—for the price. White v. Williams, 1 Paige, 502, 2 L. ed. 721.

The lien is not absolutely extinguished by the assignment of the note, where the liability of the vendor continued upon the note, by reason of the indorsement, but was in a sort of abeyance, and might be revived by the vendor, after he should have paid the note on his liability as indorser. Richards v. Leaming, 27 Ill. 431, 81 Am. Dec. 240; Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 172, 81 Am. Dec. 154. See Briggs v. Hill, 6 How. (Miss.) 362; Brush v. Kinsley, 14 Ohio, 20; Wellborn v. Williams, 9 Ga. 89; Smith v. Smith, 9 Abb. Pr. 420.

If the vendor indorses the note and is afterwards obliged to take it up at maturity, upon failure of the vendee to pay, the lien revives and takes effect as if no assignment had been made. Kelly v. Payne, 18 Ala. 371; Turner v. Horner, 29 Ark. 440; White v. Williams, 1 Paige, 502, 2 L. ed. 721; Lindsey v. Bates, 42 Miss. 357; Cotton v. McGehee, 54 Miss. 510; Rogers v. James, 33 Ark. 77; Scott v. Mann, 36 Tex. 157.

by the assignment of the note, and, being thus secured, an attachment was improper. The affidavit filed in support of the motion states that the defendant purchased certain land from Webster under a contract which provided for payment of the purchase price by installments, and that at the time and place of making said contract for the sale and purchase of said lot of land, and as part of the said contract, the defendant executed and delivered to Webster the promissory note sued on, and that Webster still holds, against the defendant, the contract giving him the right to purchase. There is, perhaps, no subject of equity jurisprudence discussed in the books upon which there is a greater diversity of opinion than exists in relation to the origin, nature, and effect of a vendors' lien, against whom and in whose favor it avails, and how it may be discharged or waived. Hammond v. Peyton, 34 Minn. 531. The various definitions given and principles applied to it by the courts, are hopelessly irreconcilable; and, if we take the expressions found in decisions and text-books without observing the distinction between the lien implied by law in favor of a vendor who has parted with the legal title and taken no security for the purchase money, and the security which the vendor has while he holds the legal title under an unexecuted contract for the conveyance of lands upon payment of the purchase money, there will appear to be great confusion and inconsistency. The former, the implied lien, is properly known as a "vendors' lien." It is the creature of courts of equity, founded upon the equitable presumption that where the vendor has parted with his title and taken no security for the payment of the purchase money, the parties intended that the property itself should remain as a pledge for the payment of the purchase price of the land. The lien thus created by implication is not a specific, absolute charge upon the property; it is personal to the vendor, and does not pass by a transfer of his claim for the purchase money. The fee is in the purchaser, and he may defeat the lien by a conveyance to a bona fide purchaser for value. Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186; Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 172; Lehndorf v. Cope, 122 Ill. 833, 11 West. Rep. 618. The latter is improperly designated as a vendors' lien. Where the vendor holds the legal title under an unexecuted contract for the conveyance of the land upon payment of the purchase money, the transaction shows upon its face that he holds it as security. The vendee cannot prejudice that title, or in any way devalue it, except by performance of the act for which the vendor holds it. The vendor's security is something stronger than a mortgage, because the legal title is retained as security. Stevens v. Chadwick, 10 Kan. 413. It has been called an "imperfect" or "equitable" mortgage, which is more appropriate term than "vendors' lien." Moore v. Lackey, 53 Miss. 85. In many of the best-considered cases, including Sparks v. Hess, supra, it is treated as if it had the similitude of a mortgage, subject to foreclosure in the same way a mortgage is foreclosed. There is no necessity for any lien by implication. Where the title is not to pass until the vendee pays the purchase price, the land is by express contract held in pledge for such payment, and the notes and contract may be considered as an instrument in the nature of a mortgage. It is a lien by contract, is an incident to the debt, and the assignee of notes given for the

When an assignment is made for the benefit of a third person there is no particular equity in his favor; but when for the security or payment of his own debt the equity continues, the assignee in such case holds the lien as well for the benefit of the assignor as for himself; he is subrogated to all his equities. Jones, Mort. § 216; *Carlton v. Contrary view.

In the following States the lien may be assigned with the debt:

Alabama: A transfer of the debt carries the lien (Simpson v. McAllister, 56 Ala. 223; Wells v. Morrow, 38 Ala. 125; White v. Stover, 10 Ala. 441); but if the grantor assigns the notes for the debt "without recourse," or in any other manner which cuts off all his own liability thereon, the lien is held not to pass. Bankhead v. Owen, 60 Ala. 457; Barnett v. Riser, 63 Ala. 347; Walker v. Carroll, 65 Ala. 61.

Indiana: Nichols v. Glover, 41 Ind. 24; Johns v. Sewell, 33 Ind. 1; Wiseman v. Hutchinson, 20 Ind. 40; Kern v. Haslerigg, 11 Ind. 443.

purchase money, like the assignee of a note secured by mortgage, is entitled to the benefit of the security. Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619 (filed February 6, 1891); Wright v. Troutman, 81 Ill. 374; Adams v. Cowherd, 30 Mo. 460; Lowery v. Peterson, 75 Ala. 109; Bradley v. Curtis, 79 Ky. 327; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. 448; Lagow v. Badollet, 1 Blackf. 419; Dingley v. Bank of Ventura, 57 Cal. 471. There are a few decisions to the contrary, some of which inveigh against the rule, and, emanating, as they do, from highly respectable authority, are entitled to careful consideration; but they bear evidence of a departure from sound legal rules, and will be found generally to have been influenced by decisions in cases where the legal title had passed to the vendee, thus overlooking the distinction we have attempted to point out, and which is paramount always in determining questions of this kind. The authorities preponderate very decidedly in favor of the view we have expressed. 2 Jones, Liens, § 1119, note.

The provisions of our Civil Code, §§ 3046, 3047, apply to the vendor's lien proper, and not to the security held by a vendor under an unexecuted contract for the sale of land. There has been, and still exists, a great conflict of decision among the American courts, not only as to the nature of the security of the implied lien, but as to whether it could be assigned, and what act of the vendor would amount to a waiver of the lien. Perry, Tr. 4th ed. § 328, note 4. The notes of the code commissioners, and cases cited by them under the sections above referred to, show that it was intended to settle this conflict by express enactment. Ann. Civil Code, §§ 3045, 3046, notes; Avery v. Clark, supra.

We are not called upon in this case to say whether the purchaser of a negotiable note for value, without notice of the security held by a vendor of real estate under an unexecuted contract, would have the right to a writ of attachment. The affidavit, on motion to discharge the writ herein, stated that plaintiff "purchased the note sued upon in this action with full knowledge that the same was given as collateral to and identical with the debt secured by said contract and the lien on said real estate." The note having been secured originally by the vendor's lien, and plaintiff having taken it with notice of that fact, it was his duty to state in his affidavit for the writ "that such security has without any act of the plaintiff, or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless." Such is the requirement of the Statute. Section 538, Code Civil Proc. The affidavit upon which the attachment was issued states that the payment of the sum claimed "has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property." The affidavit filed by defendant in support of his motion to discharge the writ states facts showing that the note was originally secured. No counter-affidavit was filed by plaintiff. The attachment was improperly issued, and therefore the motion should have been granted.

The order is reversed, with directions to discharge the attachment.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; De Haven, J.; Garoutte, J.; Harrison, J.

McFarland, J.:

I dissent, and adhere to the views expressed in the former opinion. 24 Pac. Rep. 608. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that the owner in fee of land, who simply agrees to convey it upon the payment to him of certain money evidenced by a promissory note, is in the same position as one who conveys the land and takes back a mortgage; or that if, in the former case, he merely assigns the promissory note, the assignee of the note has a lien on the land. If the latter can enforce such a lien, he must be able to release it. But how could he release it? It could be released only by conveying the land to the vendee, but how could he convey that which he hath not? If, after the assignment of the note, the vendor should convey the land to the vendee, what then would be the condition of the supposed lien of the assignee of the note? The whole doctrine must rest on the untenable proposition that the assignment of a negotiable promissory note is a conveyance in fee of land.

I know that some of the recent text-writers speak of such a case as bearing "a strong similitude to that of mortgagee and mortgagor," and say that, although it "is often spoken of in the cases as a vendors' lien," yet, in their opinion, such language is "a misuse of terms;" and that, although "it has been said, in English and American decisions, that the vendors' lien may arise before conveyance as well as after," yet that this saying "confounds legal notions which are essentially different." But, in my opinion, those "English and American decisions" correctly state the law, and tend to prevent confusion. In this State Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 194, is the leading case on the subject. In that case the court says: "This is not a suit to enforce a vendors' lien after conveyance executed, but to enforce such lien when the contract of sale remains unexecuted;" and that, while the position of the vendor is "in some respects" like that of a mortgagee, it is in other respects different. "The vendor is at liberty to ask either a decree directing performance, and in case of refusal a sale of the premises, or a decree barring the right of the vendee to claim a conveyance under the contract." Throughout the whole case the right of the plaintiff is treated as and called a "vendors' lien;" and there is no doctrine better established than that a vendors' lien is not assignable. In the case at bar there was no conveyance of the legal title from the owner of the land (Webster) to the assignee of the note; and, in my opinion, the mere assignment of the note carried no title to the land, and no vendors' lien, nor any lien at all. But, in my opinion, a vendor's right is too shadowy to be a lien, within the meaning of the Attachment Law.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

PENNSYLVANIA CO., Pff. in Err.,
v.

Jacob LANGENDORF.

(48 Ohio St.)

- *1. It is not negligence per se for one to voluntarily risk his own safety or life in attempting to rescue another from impending danger. The question whether one so acting should be charged with contributory negligence in an action brought by him to recover damages for injuries received in attempting the rescue, is one of mixed law and fact, and should be submitted to the jury upon the evidence, with proper instructions from the court.
2. While one who rashly and unnecessarily exposes himself to danger cannot recover damages for injuries thus brought on himself, yet, where another is in great and imminent danger, one who attempts a rescue may be warranted by surrounding circumstances in exposing his limbs or life to a very high degree of danger; and in such cases he should not be charged with the consequences of errors of judgment resulting from the excitement and confusion of the moment.
3. In such cases, if the rescuer does not rashly and unnecessarily expose himself to danger, and is injured, the injury should be attributed to the party that negligently or wrongfully exposed to danger the person who required assistance.

(May 5, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lucas County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

The defendant in error recovered a judgment against the plaintiff in error in the Court of Common Pleas of Lucas County for damages resulting from an injury received by him while rescuing a child of tender years, who had fallen in front of an advancing freight train of the plaintiff in error. This judgment was affirmed by the circuit court, and thereupon these proceedings were brought to obtain a reversal of the judgments of both courts.

*Head notes by the COURT.

NOTE.—Negligence; assuming risk, to save human life; not contributory negligence.

A person who steps upon a railroad track in a humane effort to save others from danger from an approaching train cannot be held a trespasser. Spooner v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 22.

Where there is a sudden emergency, allowing but little time for deliberation, and the life of a fellow creature is in danger, it does not follow, as a matter of law, that in encountering danger to rescue life a person is necessarily guilty of want of reasonable care. Buel v. New York Cent. R. Co. 31 N. Y. 314, 13 L. R. A.

Any further statement of facts necessary to understand the questions decided will be found in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Tolerton, for plaintiff in error: No one can recover for an injury or loss which he himself has contributed to occasion.

Hott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 811; Corwin v. New York & E. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 42; Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Hiatt, 17 Ind. 102.

It was the duty of the court to say to the jury that, as a matter of law, it was a rash act for the plaintiff to throw himself upon the track, knowing that a train was coming, with his back towards the train, and without any attempt to look or observe it. The law will impute negligence to the act "if made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons."

Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 502.

If plaintiff could have, by the use of ordinary care, prevented the child from going upon the track in the first place, or might have, by the use of ordinary care, followed the child across the track, and prevented it from returning to a place of danger, then it was his duty to do so, and his neglect to do so, and his omission to act until the child was in extreme peril, was an act of negligence which bars his right to recover.

Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Hiatt, supra.

Messrs. Bissell & Gorrill for defendant in error.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, in June, 1885, while passing along one of the streets in East Toledo, stopped at a point where the track of the railway of plaintiff in error crossed the street, and engaged in conversation with a woman who had in charge two children, one an infant in arms, the other a girl about four years old. The plaintiff in error had constructed a safety-gate at this point, and during the greater part of the day kept there a watchman to close the same when trains were approaching, as a warning to travelers. The accident that caused the injury occurred about 7 o'clock in the evening, or a little later, but while it was yet light. The watchman had finished his day's labor, and gone away, and the gate was raised (or open), though the street was, perhaps, as extensively used at that hour as at any other part of the day. A local freight train was past due, and

A person with a view to his own self-preservation may take a risk upon himself, short of mere rashness and recklessness, even if it was not the wisest and most prudent course under the circumstances. Mayo v. Boston & M. R. Co. 104 Mass. 187.

What is ordinary or reasonable care is usually to be determined by the judgment and experience of the jury, and not of the judge. Gaynor v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 100 Mass. 208. See Lane v. Atlantic Works, 107 Mass. 104; Rexter v. Starin, 73 N. Y. 601.

Mere error of judgment in case of danger is not contributory negligence. See note to Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 195.

approaching at a higher rate of speed than that prescribed by the ordinances of the city. The defendant in error and the nurse were engaged in conversation at a point from which the approaching train was in view for a considerable distance, though exactly how far away it could be seen is left in some doubt. The little girl, while her nurse and defendant in error were conversing, wandered across the railroad track, and, seeing or hearing the approaching train, became excited by the sight or noise or both, and by clapping her hands and other manifestations of surprise and delight, attracted the attention of her nurse certainly, and, probably, that of the defendant in error also. The nurse excitedly called the child to her, and while crossing the railroad track in obedience to the call it tripped and fell in front of the rapidly approaching train, whereupon the defendant in error, observing its imminent peril, sprang to its rescue, caught it in his arms, and leaped onward, but was struck by the locomotive before he could pass beyond its reach, and received the injuries of which he complains. That the safety-gate was raised, and the watchman absent, was not disputed at the trial, so far as the record discloses; and the evidence is amply sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the train was being run at an unlawful rate of speed, so that in both these particulars the negligence of the Railroad Company was established. It is contended, however, that the negligence of the Railroad Company should have related to the party injured, and that the jury, in passing upon the case of the defendant in error, should not have taken into consideration the rights of the rescued child, but should have confined itself to considering the relations existing between him and the Railroad Company; and in this connection the plaintiff in error requested the court of common pleas to charge the jury as follows: "The plaintiff's right to recover depends entirely upon the fact that the defendant was guilty of negligence in its relations to this plaintiff. The jury, in deliberating upon your verdict, must not consider the rights of the child. This action has nothing to do with her rights. The sole questions here are, Was the defendant guilty of negligence which caused the plaintiff's injuries? and Was the plaintiff himself guilty of contributory negligence?" This request was properly refused. Negligence does not usually relate to anyone in particular, and does not in any case so relate unless there is some special duty owing to the individual affected by the negligent act or omission. In the case under review the Railroad Company owed no special duty to either the rescuer or the rescued that it would not have owed to any individuals similarly situated. The obligation was to the public generally; and any person who, without fault on his part, received an injury in consequence of its failure to discharge this obligation, may recover from it compensation therefor. No other relation is necessary, where the obligation is to the public, than that the one by its negligence has caused injury to the other without the latter's fault. It is also objectionable in another particular,—that of requiring the jury to ignore the rights of the child. It is true that the child in its relations to the Railroad Company might have a right of action for injuries received by it, and yet no right accrue to the defendant in error for those received by him in the same accident. The circumstance that the child had a right of action could not be conclusive that the defendant in error had one also, though the same blow of the locomotive injured both, for the negligence of the latter might contribute to the result in a manner to defeat his recovery, while no negligence could be imputed to the child. If it was the object of this request to impress upon the minds of the jury the proposition above stated, that the rights of action of the child and its rescuer against the Railroad Company were distinct, the language selected was not well chosen. The phrase: "The jury, in deliberating on your verdict, must not consider the rights of the child. This action has nothing to do with her rights"—was well adapted to mislead the jury into the belief that the imminent danger of the child, and its right to be rescued therefrom, were to be excluded from their consideration. This view would have defeated the recovery, for the very ground upon which the defendant in error founded his claim was that the imminent peril of the child warranted the risk he assumed in undertaking its rescue.

This brings us to the consideration of the main question. Plaintiff in error contends that it was negligence per se for the defendant in error to throw himself in front of a moving train in his effort to rescue the child from danger. The petition of the plaintiff below discloses that he received the injury of which he complained by voluntarily passing in front of a moving train to rescue a child who had fallen in front of it; therefore, if such an act is negligence per se, the petition disclosed that the negligence of the plaintiff below contributed to the injury, and he was not entitled to maintain an action therefor. The same question was raised by an exception taken to the following part of the charge of the court: "It appears that the plaintiff was struck by the engine and injured while in the act of passing across the track and rescuing a little child from danger and saving its life. To hold the Railroad Company responsible in damages for this injury it must be shown (1) that the child was in danger of being run over and injured by the approaching engine, and that such danger was caused or created by the negligence of the Railroad Company; and (2) that in making the effort to rescue the child the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. These are questions of fact which it will be your duty to determine from the evidence. . . . If you find that the peril to which the child was exposed was caused by such negligence of the Company, you will then inquire whether the plaintiff, in passing across the track and attempting to rescue the child, was guilty of contributory negligence. The law will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve human life, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons. . . . If he believed, and had good reason to believe, that he could save the life of the child, without serious injury to himself, the law will not impute to him blame for making the effort." Plaintiff in error insists that the court of common pleas, instead of leaving the question, as it did, to the jury, to say whether the act of the defendant in error, under all the circumstances, and according to the rules laid down by the court, was or was not negligent, should have told them that to pass in front of a rapidly moving train, as it was admitted the defendant in error did, even to rescue from danger a child of tender years, was in law an act of negligence that defeated his right of recovery. It is said that the defendant in error voluntarily assumed the risk, that the danger attending his act was apparent; and that, however commendable his conduct may have been when viewed from the stand-point of humanity, the law will grant no relief for an injury thus brought upon himself. It is apparent that the defendant in error was under no legal obligation to rescue the child. If he had chosen to stand by and permit the approaching train to run over and kill the child, he would have violated no rule of law, civil or criminal. Therefore what he did in the matter was a voluntary act in the sense of that term that he was under no legal obligation to perform it. That, however, is not a conclusive test of the question. To entitle one to relief for the consequences of the negligence of another it is by no means necessary that the party injured should have been at the time in the discharge of any duty whatever. His rights in this respect are perfect when he is in the performance of any lawful act, and even, in some instances and in some States, when the act is in some respects not strictly lawful. The act of the defendant in error was not only lawful, but it was highly commendable; nor was he in any legal sense responsible for the emergency that called for such prompt decision and rapid execution. The negligence of the Railroad Company in having no watchman at this public crossing, and the unlawful rate of speed at which the train was running towards it, to which may, perhaps, be added that of the nurse in charge of the child, were the causes of its extreme danger. There was but the fraction of a minute in which to resolve and act, or action would come too late. Under these circumstances it would be unreasonable to require a deliberate judgment from one in a position to afford relief. To require one so situated to stop and weigh the danger to himself of an attempt to rescue another, and compare it with that overhanging the person to be rescued, would be in effect to deny the right of rescue altogether if the danger was imminent. The attendant circumstances must be regarded; the alarm, the excitement, and confusion usually present on such occasions; the uncertainty as to the proper move to be made; the promptness required; and the liability to mistake as to what is best to be done, suggest that much latitude of judgment should be allowed to those who are thus forced by the strongest dictates of humanity to decide and act in sudden emergencies. And the doctrine that one who, under those or similar circumstances, springs to the rescue of another, thereby encountering even great danger to himself, is guilty of negligence per se, is supported by neither principle nor authority.

In Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Hiatt, 17 Ind. 102, language is used by the judge in deciding the case, which, to some extent, supports the doctrine, but the decision was not placed upon that ground, and what the learned judge said in that connection may be regarded as obiter dictum. The doctrine is repudiated by the text-writers and all the other cases that come to our notice. In Eckert v. Long Island R. Co., 43 N. Y. 502, it was held that "the law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under circumstances constituting rashness in the judgment of prudent persons." In that case the rescuer lost his life in throwing a small child from the track of an approaching train, and a judgment in favor of his administrator for damages resulting from his death was affirmed by the court of appeals. The resemblance between that case and the one before us is very striking. This doctrine has received the sanction of the courts of last resort in Massachusetts and Missouri. Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506; Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 88 Mo. 560; Beach, Contrib. Neg. p. 45, § 15; Wharton, Neg. § 814; Pierce, Railroads, 329. The doctrine that one is not necessarily chargeable with contributory negligence because he adopted a course of action that imperiled his safety, or even his life, finds support in other courts. Carroll v. Minnesota Valley R. Co. 14 Minn. 57; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roney, 89 Ind. 453; Cottrill v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Wis. 634. We think the court of common pleas did not err in leaving it to the jury to determine from all the circumstances surrounding the defendant in error at the time he sprang to the rescue whether the act was rash or not, and in saying to them that, if they found it was not rash, then it did not constitute contributory negligence. It is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down in advance a rule by which to determine the extent to which one may risk his safety or his life in emergencies of this character, and not be charged with rashness; but the emergency may be such as to warrant the assumption of a high degree of risk, and one so situated may rightfully expect his acts to be construed in the light afforded by all the circumstances that impelled him to their commission, and that he would not be charged with contributing to his own injury, so as to defeat a right of action, because the result showed that the risk he assumed was greater than in the excitement of the moment he had contemplated, or in some other respect his judgment had been faulty.

Judgment affirmed.

1. The forgery of the necessary signature of the treasurer to certificates of stock by the president of a corporation whose only authority as to the issue of certificates is to sign them does not make the corporation liable therefor to holders who took them in private and personal transactions with the president.
2. A corporation is not negligent in permitting its president to continue in office and have access to its certificate book and seal so as to make it liable for his act in issuing forged certificates of stock by reason of his former misconduct in pledging his own shares to another person in violation of an agreement to pledge them to his associates in the corporation.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Morton, J.) for the opinion of the full court of two actions brought to establish the alleged rights of plaintiffs as stockholders in defendant corporation, in which verdicts had been directed in favor of defendant. Judgment on the verdicts.

NOTE.—Corporation not liable for misfeasance of its officers.

A stockholder in a bank cannot maintain an action against the directors for their misfeasance in delegating the whole control of its affairs to the president and cashier, who waste and lose the capital, the injury being to the corporation direct and only remotely to the stockholders. Smith v. Hurd, 12 Met. 371.

Where a person had notice that the surrender and transfer of certificates of stock were prerequisites to the lawful issue of new stock, and accepted the new certificate without assuring herself that such prerequisites had been complied with, she is not an innocent holder of the stock. Moore v. Citizens Nat. Bank of Piqua, 111 U. S. 156, 28 L. ed. 385. See Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 716, 150 Mass. 200.

Where one buys a certificate of corporate stock not under seal of the corporation and not signed by the person whom he knows is its president, he cannot be said to be an innocent purchaser. Byers v. Rollins, 13 Colo. 22.

In such case if the party fails to investigate the title to the stock, he is affected with notice of whatever he might have discovered upon making proper inquiry. Farrington v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 849, 150 Mass. 406.

A pledge to a bona fide pledgee of fraudulently issued certificates of corporate stock is not a pledge of shares of stock, but simply of a right to receive indemnity for the fraudulent acts of the officers in issuing the spurious shares. Kisterbock's App. 127 Pa. 601.

Damages to a holder of shares of stock fraudulently issued by corporate officers should be measured by the market value of valid stock at the time 13 L. R. A.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Robert M. Morse, Jr., and Charles E. Hellier, for plaintiffs:

These cases must be governed by Allen v. South Boston R. Co. and Craft v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 716, 150 Mass. 200.

It was held, in both cases, that the plaintiffs could recover.

See also Titus v. Great Western Turnp. R. 61 N. Y. 237; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 84 N. Y. 80; Bridgeport Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 30 Conn. 231; Willis v. Philadelphia & D. R. Co. 6 W. N. C. 461; Bank of Kentucky v. Schuylkill Bank, 1 Pars. Eq. (Pa.) 180.

The only cases where the corporation has been held not liable to holders for value of certificates fraudulently issued by an officer of the corporation are—

Farrington v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 849, 150 Mass. 406; Moore v. Citizens Nat. Bank of Piqua, 111 U. S. 156, 28 L. ed. 385.

The ground of the decisions in these cases was the same, namely, that the fact that the certificates were newly issued in the name of the party who took them as collateral security for a private loan to the officer who issued them put the person so taking them upon inquiry as to whether a former certificate had been surrendered, in accordance with the provision on the face of the certificate received.

The gist of the plaintiffs' cases lies in the negligence of the defendant corporation, which has permitted a fraud to be perpetrated to the when the corporation refused to recognize the corporate shares as valid. Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 716, 150 Mass. 200.

Negligence; responsibility for proximate or direct consequences:

A defendant is not answerable for anything beyond the natural, ordinary and reasonable consequences of his conduct. Bennett v. Lockwood, 20 Wend. 223; Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 523; Vedder v. Hildreth, 2 Wis. 427.

Where the wrongful act of one person merely affords an opportunity or occasion for the illegal acts of another, the injury in such cases is too remote. Cuff v. Newark & N. Y. R. Co. 35 N. J. L. 30; Scholes v. North London R. Co. 21 L. T. N. S. 835.

An original, wrongful or negligent act will not be regarded as the proximate cause where some new agency, not within the reasonable contemplation of the negligent actor, has intervened to bring about the injury. Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 65 Tex. 274; Gilliland v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 139, 19 Mo. App. 411.

If one's fault happens to concur with something extraordinary and not likely to have been foreseen he will not be answerable for the unexpected result. Fairbanks v. Kerr, 70 Pa. 86; People v. Albany, 5 Lans. 524; McGrew v. Stone, 53 Pa. 436. See notes to Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 194; Read v. Nichols (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 130; Smith v. Kanawha County Ct. (W. Va.) 8 L. R. A. 82.

The damage for which recovery may be had must always be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of. Vedder v. Hildreth, 2 Wis. 427; Walker v. Ellis, 1 Sneed, 515; Ehrgott v. New York, 98 N. Y. 264; Wiley v. West Jersey R. Co. 44 N. J. L. 247.

detriment of the plaintiffs; and the mode in which the fraud has been accomplished is immaterial, except so far as it may bear on the notice to the plaintiffs or their reasonable care.

Shaw v. Port Philip & C. Gold Min. Co. L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 108; Machinists Nat. Bank v. Field, 126 Mass. 345; Re Balia & S. F. R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 584.

A corporation is estopped to deny the validity of certificates issued in proper form under the seal, and duly signed by the officers authorized to issue certificates, if they are held by persons who took them for value, without knowledge or notice that they had been fraudulently issued.

Allen v. South Boston R. Co. supra; Boston & A. R. v. Richardson, 185 Mass. 473; Machinists Nat. Bank v. Field, supra; Pratt v. Taunton Copper Co. 123 Mass. 110; Moores v. Citizens Nat. Bank of Piqua, 111 U. S. 156, 28 L. ed. 385; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Holbrook v. New Jersey Zinc Co. 57 N. Y. 616; Shaw v. Port Philip & C. Gold Min. Co. supra. See also Holden v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 138 Mass. 48.

The plaintiffs were under no legal obligation or duty to investigate the validity of the certificates received by them, or to question Jewett's title to the same.

Salisbury Mills v. Townsend, 109 Mass. 115.

It is not necessary to the conveyance of the legal title to a certificate of stock to record the transfer of the shares in the books of the corporation; the delivery of the certificate with an assignment thereof is sufficient.

Loring v. Salisbury Mills, 125 Mass. 150; Stone v. Hackett, 12 Gray, 231; Eames v. Wheeler, 19 Pick. 444.

Messrs. Samuel J. Elder and William Cushing Wait, for defendant:

Plaintiff's certificates being forgeries are not the contracts of the Company; and no implied contract can be raised to issue new ones in their places. To have complied with plaintiffs' demands would have been to over-issue the stock of the corporation, which it could not be compelled to do.

Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 716, 150 Mass. 200, 207; Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co. L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 77; British Mut. Bkg. Co. v. Charnwood Forest R. [Co.] L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 714.

A corporation is estopped to deny the validity of certificates issued in proper form under its seal, and duly signed by the officers authorized to issue certificates, if they are held by persons who took them for value without knowledge or notice that they had been fraudulently issued.

Allen v. South Boston R. Co. supra.

In these cases the certificates were not "duly signed by the officers authorized to issue certificates," and they were taken under circumstances which put the taker upon inquiry and which affect him with notice of all that he could have learned by inquiry.

Farrington v. South Boston R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 849, 150 Mass. 406.

distinguished from the present. A declaration to create an estoppel must be made "by a party whose duty it was to know and state the truth and be relied upon by one who had no other means of information or was justified in relying upon such declarations.

Hambleton v. Central Ohio R. Co. 44 Md. 551.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The by-laws of the defendant corporation provide that "each stockholder shall be entitled to a certificate of stock under the seal of the corporation, and signed by its president and treasurer." The certificates taken by the respective plaintiffs each called for these two signatures and purported to bear them. The plaintiffs were therefore apprised of the necessity for two signatures. In point of fact, however, the certificates did not bear the signature of the treasurer, his name having been forged by the president. There was no special provision in the by-laws, giving the president anything to do in respect to the issuing of certificates of shares, except a requirement that he should sign all such certificates. Transfers were to be recorded by the clerk. The purchaser named in a transfer so recorded was entitled to a new certificate upon producing the transfer to the treasurer, and delivering to him the former certificates. There was no actual or ostensible authority in the president to issue certificates. He was only to sign them. The certificates taken by the plaintiffs were invalid for want of the two signatures required by the by-laws.

But the plaintiffs contend that the defendant is nevertheless bound to make the certificates good, or responsible for their being bad, on the ground that it was negligent in permitting Jewett to remain president of the corporation, in view of his previous known misconduct, and to have control of its certificate book and seal, and that the cases fall within the principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer a loss from the fraud of a third, the loss must be borne by the one whose negligence enabled the third person to commit the fraud.

In order to reach this conclusion, it must be made to appear that the frauds and forgeries of Jewett were such natural and probable results of his continuance in the office of president of the corporation that the defendant ought to have anticipated and guarded against them, and also that the plaintiffs on their part exercised due diligence and precaution in accepting the certificates from him.

In the absence of any previous misconduct on Jewett's part, it could hardly be maintained that there was any negligence on the part of the corporation in keeping its seal and book of certificates of shares where the president could have access to them, so as to be able to remove blank certificates from the end of the book and impress the corporate seal upon them. We are not aware that it is customary for corporations in this country to keep their seals or books of certificates in such a way that access to them can only be had when two or more officers are present.

The chief safeguard in respect to the certificates is the necessity of two signatures. And accordingly when one who has had confidence reposed in him has availed himself of his opportunity to commit a fraud upon others by means of forgery, it has usually been held in England that the loss was not a natural or probable result of the confidence thus reposed, even though it showed carelessness, and that it was too remote to be properly chargeable upon those who were thus careless in reposing the confidence. Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Charities, 5 H. L. Cas. 389; Staple of England v. Bank of England, L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 160, 176; Swan v. North British Australasian Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 175, 189. See also Vagliano v. Bank of England, L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 103, 117, on appeal, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 243, 255, 263.

The plaintiffs rely much on Shaw v. Port Philip & C. Gold Min. Co., L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 103, which in many of its general features much resembles the present case, but with certain differences. In that case the secretary of the defendant Company issued a certificate of shares, with the name of a director forged by himself. The person to whom it was issued bought shares on the market, through a broker, who received a transfer signed by the secretary, accompanied by what purported and in all respects appeared to be a regularly issued certificate of those shares. These were deposited at the company's office, with the request for the issue of a new certificate, in the usual way. The new certificate was issued, in the usual form by the secretary, but the signature of a director, which was required, was forged. It was a part of the regular and authorized duty of the secretary to receive and examine transfers and certificates of shares, to have transfers registered, to procure the preparation, execution and signature of certificates, with all requisite and prescribed formalities, and thereupon to issue them to the persons entitled to receive them. Moreover, the Company, after the issue of the certificate, paid a dividend thereon, by check signed by the secretary and two directors. The decision of the case, which was not heard before the court of appeal, was placed on the ground that the Company had made it the duty of the secretary to procure the preparation, execution and signature of certificates with the prescribed formalities, and thereupon to issue them to the person entitled to receive them. The principal fact upon which the decision turned is wanting in the case before us. The president of the defendant corporation was not the proper officer to issue certificates, and the certificates which the plaintiffs received did not come from the office of the defendant in regular course of business, but they were received by the plaintiffs under private and personal transactions between themselves and Jewett, the president.

The plaintiffs, however, contend that the previous and known misconduct of Jewett had been such that it distinguishes the present case from others, and that by reason thereof the defendant should be held responsible for his acts. This misconduct consisted 13 L. R. A.

in pledging his shares to Evans & Co. when he had agreed to pledge them to his associates in the corporation. According to the original understanding when the corporation was formed, Estes & Lauriat subscribed and paid for the whole of the stock, but there was an agreement under which Jewett was to have the option of buying one half of the stock at a certain price at any time within one year. Jewett was president of the company, and Jackson, one of the firm of Estes & Lauriat, was treasurer. In the absence of the two senior members of the firm, Jewett elected to take his half of the stock, but stated that he could not very easily pay for it then, and Jackson consented to issue the certificates to him with the understanding that he was to give his notes for them, and that the firm would hold the stock as collateral. The stock was accordingly issued to Jewett, who took it, and did not pledge it to the firm, but afterwards pledged it to Evans & Co. There is no distinct statement how it happened that Jewett was allowed to take away the certificates, instead of pledging them on the spot to the firm; nor how soon afterwards he pledged them to Evans. Apparently confidence was reposed in him, and at any rate there is nothing to show that any steps were taken to compel him to pledge the shares to the firm according to his promise. What Jackson did in consenting to the issue of the stock to Jewett without retaining them in pledge was within his power as a member of the firm.

On the whole, we find nothing to show that the corporation or its other members had reason to suppose from what Jewett had done that he would be likely to issue forged certificates of shares, if allowed access to the certificate book and seal of the corporation; and accordingly it is not to be held responsible for his criminal fraud, as for an act made possible by its negligence.

In the cases heretofore determined by this court, where a corporation was held responsible for the fraudulent issue of shares, the certificates were in fact signed by the proper officers whose signatures were required, and there was carelessness on the part of the president in leaving certificates signed in blank by himself with the treasurer, and also carelessness on the part of other officers of the Company. Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 200, 5 L. R. A. 716.

NOTE.—Aiders and abettors of crime are all principals.

Anyone who counsels, aids or abets in the commission of any offense may be charged, tried and bringing intoxicating liquors into a city to be sold illegally, where, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe, that the purchaser intends to sell them illegally, he habitually delivers them to him either personally or by his subordinates, although he does not know that the liquors were ordered until they came, and neither has nor could have anything to do with the transportation until they are brought to the city.

(May 22, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County made during the trial of an indictment charging defendant with bringing into Lowell certain intoxicating liquors having reasonable cause to believe that they were intended to be sold in violation of law, which resulted in defendant's conviction. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Walter I. Badger for defendant.

Mr. A. E. Pillsbury, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in this case was charged with bringing into the City of Lowell certain intoxicating liquors, having reasonable cause to believe that the same were intended to be sold in said city in violation of law. It was agreed at the trial that the City of Lowell granted no licenses at the time named in the complaint. It is well settled that one

Murphy*, 145 Mass. 250.

In the present case there was no testimony directly connecting the defendant with the transportation of the liquors which he was charged with bringing into the City of Lowell. The next question is whether there was any evidence tending to show that he aided or abetted in any way in bringing them into that city. And we think there was such evidence.

The defendant was the agent in Lowell of the New England Despatch Company, which was a common carrier between Boston and Lowell and other places. He drove one of the wagons in Lowell and hired and had charge of the other drivers there. In the ordinary course of the business of the company some of the goods carried by it to Lowell were received and transported in the following way: Customers in Lowell wrote their orders which were enclosed in sealed envelopes directed to certain parties in Boston, and sent or brought them to the company's office in Lowell. Sometimes the defendant took them and sometimes others in the office, but generally the cashier. These orders were put into a messenger's box in the office and were taken by the messenger to Boston and there delivered to the various parties to whom they were directed. Another person, a driver, in the company's employ at Boston, called at the various places for the goods thus ordered and collected and delivered them to the baggage master of the Boston & Maine Railroad, who placed them in the baggage car under the charge of one of the company's Lowell messengers and on the way to Lowell they were checked off by the messenger on the way bills accompanying the goods. Neither the defendant nor any of the employees knew the contents of the orders and the way bills did not describe the contents of the packages. When the goods arrived at Lowell they were delivered to the employees of the company, of whom the defendant was one, and they delivered them to the parties ordering them.

The liquors in question were brought into Lowell by the company in the ordinary course of business as thus described, but the defendant had no personal knowledge that they had been ordered or were to be received at Lowell till they were in the company's office at Lowell and none of the other employees at the Lowell office knew of it till the messenger checked off the packages containing them after the train had left Boston. There was evidence tending to show that a part of the liquors described in the complaint were marked "B Club" and that the defendant told one of the government witnesses that liquors marked "B Club" were to be delivered to such persons in Lowell as should be designated by a man named Bartlett in Lowell; and a short time prior to the 8th of September, 1890, the day named in the complaint, liquors marked "B Club" on the boxes of which were the company's tags had been found in places in Lowell where liquors were illegally sold. There was also evidence that the defendant knew or had reasonable cause to believe that a portion of the liquors in question were intended to be sold in Lowell in violation of law and that the express company had previously brought intoxicating liquors into Lowell with such knowledge or with reasonable cause to believe that it was to be sold. It also appeared that the defendant had been before cautioned by police officers at Lowell not to deliver liquor to illegal dealers therein and had replied that he was not doing different from other express companies and was not doing as much as some of the others. It further appeared that teams under defendant's direction had been delivering liquors constantly since the first of May and he stated in the course of his testimony that he had to see that things went on right, that he had charge of the teams and drove some himself; that he first took charge after the goods reached Lowell and that he meant he wasn't bringing so much beer as the rest of the companies.

Upon this evidence it was clearly competent for the jury to find, as they must have found under the instructions of the court, that the despatch company undertook the business of transporting intoxicating liquors to Lowell indiscriminately as a general and habitual practice where it knew or had reasonable cause to believe that the same were intended to be used in violation of law. And the jury must have further found, as they were also justified in doing under the instructions of the court, that the defendant knew that such was its course of business and knowingly assisted and aided in the same by his own acts and that the liquors in question or a part of them were brought into Lowell in pursuance of such general course of business in which the defendant so participated and were in fact illegally transported, and that defendant performed a necessary part of the machinery in carrying on this illegal business.

The defendant cannot excuse himself on the ground that he did not know that the order was sent from Lowell for the liquors in question or that he did not know they were coming from Boston until they were received at the company's office in Lowell or that he did not himself bring them or manually aid in bringing them from Boston to Lowell, and could not have forbidden or controlled their transportation from Boston to Lowell. When the liquors arrived at Lowell he knew or had reasonable cause to believe that they were intended for sale in Lowell in violation of law. He had reason to know from the course of the business that they had been brought to Lowell from Boston pursuant to an order from a dealer in Lowell to a dealer in Boston. And he knew that when they arrived at Lowell both the shipper in Boston and the orderer in Lowell expected that he would aid in forwarding them to their destination in Lowell. He himself expected to do this and to do it as one step in the transportation from the vendor in Boston to the purchaser and illegal seller in Lowell. In the strict sense of the words, therefore, he was aiding in bringing into Lowell intoxicating liquors with reasonable cause to believe that they were to be there sold in violation of law. He was one link in the chain of transportation from the shipper in Boston to the illegal seller in Lowell and he knowingly and voluntarily occupied that position. It was not necessary that he should know at every moment and every step what everyone else did who was engaged in aiding or abetting or committing the misdemeanor. So far as he was concerned all that was necessary was that it should appear that he knowingly aided in the commission of the misdemeanor charged. If he did he was liable. Reg. v. Swindall, 2 Car. & K. 280.

For these reasons a majority of the court think that there was no error in the instructions and that the defendant's requests were rightly refused.

Exceptions overruled.

1. The majority of the members of a Baptist Church, although it is independent APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the District Court for Van Buren County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from unlawfully using certain church buildings and records and from interfering with complainants' use of the same. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Craig, McCrary & Craig and Sloan, Work & Brown, for appellants:

The Mt. Zion Baptist Church was incorporated December 18, 1851, and at the time of its organization adopting the articles of faith and covenant published in the minutes of the Des Moines Baptist Association in the year 1848. The Church thus organized cannot be converted into a different church, even though the Church to which it is changed had subsequently the same faith.

First Constitutional Presby. Church v. Congregational Soc. 23 Iowa, 568.

That cannot be done inside of the Church by a majority which they could not do, by trying to transfer the church property to a different denomination.

Where a schism has occurred in a church organization each party may alternate in the weekly use of the church. Bowden v. McLeod, 1 Edw. Ch. 588, 8 L. ed. 267.

Distinction between church and corporation.

There is a distinction between the church and the corporation. A church is an integral part of the corporation, or rather it is the corporation in its spiritual capacity. Hardin v. Second Bapt. Church, 51 Mich. 130. See Lawyer v. Clipperly, 7 Paige, 281, 4 L. ed. 156; Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 243; Bellport v. Tooker, 20 Barb. 256; Burrell v. Associate Ref. Church, 44 Barb. 282; Miller v. Gable, 2 Denio, 482; Ferraria v. Vasconcelles, 81 Ill. 25; Calkins v. Cheney, 92 Ill. 468; Keyser v. Stansifer, 6 Ohio, 368; Shannon v. Frost, 3 B. H. 71.

Over the church as such, the legal tribunals do not profess to have any jurisdiction whatever, except to protect the civil rights of others, and preserve the public peace. Chase v. Cheney, 56 Ill. 509, 11 Am. Rep. 104.

When it appears to have been the intention of the founder of a trust for religious worship, that a particular doctrine should be preached, it is not in the power of the trustees, or of the congregation, to alter the designed objects of the institution. St. Mary's Church Case, 7 Serg. & R. 539; Den v. Bolton, 12 N. J. L. 236.

Trustees cannot fasten on the institution the promulgation of doctrines contrary to those which were intended by the founder of the society. Nor can all the other members of the congregation call upon a single remaining trustee to effectuate such change. Craigdallie v. Atkman, 1 Dow, P. C. 1; Foley v. Wontner, 2 Jac. & W. 245; Leslie v. Birnie, 2 Russ. 114; Davis v. Jenkins, 3 Ves. & B. 156; Milligan v. Mitchell, 3 Myl. & C. 72, 1 Myl. & C. 446.

If the minority of a church congregation, not acting within the regular organization, get together and assume to elect trustees, there is not the color of an election which will make them de facto officers. East Norway Lake N. E. L. Church v. Halvorson, 42 Minn. 508.

Jurisdiction of civil courts over religious associations.

Rights of property or of contract, of religious organizations, are under the protection of the law, and the actions of their members subject to its restraints. Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 606.

Courts having no ecclesiastical jurisdiction cannot revise or question ordinary acts of church discipline. 13 L. R. A.

Their only jurisdictional power arises from the conflicting claims of the parties to the church property and the use of it. Ibid.; Christ Church v. Phillips, 5 Del. Ch. 429.

Civil courts will interfere with churches or religious associations only when rights of property and civil rights are involved. Grimes v. Harmon, 85 Ind. 218; Ferraria v. Vasconcelles, 81 Ill. 46; Dieffendorf v. Canajoharie Ref. Cal. Church, 20 Johns. 12; German Ref. Church v. Seibert, 3 Pa. 291; Shannon v. Frost, 3 B. Mon. 258; Gartin v. Penick, 5 Bush, 110, 9 Am. L. Rep. N. S. 210; Forbes v. Eden, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. 568.

Where there is a schism in a religious society, though the existence of the peculiar faith or doctrines of either branch may be incidentally involved in an inquiry relative to the rights of property, all that the court can do is to enforce the observance and execution of an ascertained trust. Hale v. Everett, 58 N. H. 71; People v. Steele, 2 Barb. 367.

Where property is conveyed to a religious society to promote the teachings of particular religious doctrines, and the funds are attempted to be diverted to the support of different doctrines, chancery under its general jurisdiction over trust will interfere for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the donors. Robertson v. Bullions, 9 Barb. 126.

From the early days of Christianity Unitarian and Trinitarian have always been deemed antagonistic systems, and the courts have decided that funds given to support the teaching of the one of them are misemployed and perverted when applied to support the teaching of the other, and have redressed such misemployment. Atty-Gen. v. Pearson, 3 Meriv. 853, 7 Sim. 290; Shore v. Atty-Gen. 9 Clark & F. 365; Atty-Gen. v. Shore, 11 Sim. 592; Atty-Gen. v. Wilson, 16 Sim. 210; *Atty-Gen. v. Courts will examine into proceedings of religious bodies with indulgence, and will suppose their proceedings done in conformity with existing rights, rather than in gross usurpation of authority. Mason v. Muncester, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 445, 6 L. ed. 131.

In determining the question of legitimate succession of a religious society, where a separation has taken place, a court will adopt the rules of such society and enforce its polity in the spirit and to the effect for which it was designed. Rottmann v. Bartling, 22 Neb. 375.

Where the Constitution is silent as to the interpretation of certain books adopted by it, in respect to which honest differences of opinion arise, civil courts will not hold that adherence to either interpretation ipso facto dissolves membership. East Norway Lake N. E. L. Church v. Halvorson, 42 Minn. 508.

In case of the division of a religious corporation, the title to the church property will remain with those who retain their connection with, and conform to the usages and discipline of the organization with which they have been connected, although they may constitute only a minority.

When property is conveyed to a religious corporation to promote the teaching of particular religious doctrines, and the funds are attempted to be diverted to different doctrines, it is the duty of chancery to interfere.

Sale v. First Reg. Bapt. Church, 62 Iowa, 26; Bird v. St. Mark's Church, Id. 568; Fadness v. Braunborg, 73 Wis. 257.

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Mt. Zion Baptist Church was organized in October, 1842, and incorporated in December, 1851, and is located at Bonaparte, in Van Buren County. In 1852 it became the owner of lots 10 and 11, in block 12, in Bonaparte, and has erected buildings thereon for the use of the society, including a church and parsonage. The articles of association provide that "the articles of faith and church covenants published in the minutes of the Des Moines Baptist Association in the year 1848 shall be the articles of association adopted by this church, together with such rules of order as we may, from time to time, adopt, and the same is hereby adopted." In 1885, because of the teachings of one Aura Smith and his brother, of an experience or condition of "sanctification by a second experience," or "sinless perfection," there were differences of opinion and trouble among the members of the Church. The pastor of the Church, Rev. C. L. Custar, one H. A.

Whitmore and others, were regarded as adherents of the doctrine thus taught, and placed under charges of heterodoxy, with a request that a council of ministers and deacons be convened to hear and adjust the complaints. The persons thus charged were, at a regular meeting of the church, without trial or investigation, exonerated from the charge by a motion for that purpose. This action was had on the 7th of January, 1888. On the 4th of February thereafter charges were preferred against J. D. Israel, L. H. Mills, J. H. Murphy, Mrs. Troutman, and Mrs. Cox, who were of those opposing the alleged new doctrines. The charges were: "(1) for disregard of authority; refusing to submit to the requirements of the Church; setting aside the authority and majority of the Church in its actions and rulings; (2) for contention and strife; causing division; being leaders of evil; destroying the peace of the Church; attempting to divide the Church; (3) for false witness, testifying to things known to the Church to be entirely false, against Bro. C. L. Custar and other members of the Church in good standing." There was no trial upon the charges, but the Church proceedings show as follows: "The charges are of such a nature as to require immediate action, and motion to exclude the parties named from the fellowship of the Church carried." The record from this forward recognizes two "factions" in the Church, one designated as the "Whitmore faction," and the other as the "Israel faction;" and they are so generally spoken of in the record and arguments, the Whitmore faction being largely in the majority. On the 6th of June, 1888, the Israel faction about fifteen in number, assembled at the house of Mr. Israel, and, because of the difficulties existing in the Church, caused by the false doctrines being taught in the Church by the "former pastor, Rev. Custar, and other members of the Church, . . . namely, sanctification, a second blessing, especially to be sought for, and sinless perfection, and by using unscriptural discipline," decided that they constituted "the true and original Baptist Church of Bonaparte;" and it is this organization, with certain of its members, that are parties plaintiff for and on behalf of those having a common interest; the defendants being H. A. Whitmore and others, for and on behalf of those "associating and acting with them." The Israel faction, after deciding that it was the Church, called to its service as pastor Rev. J. L. Cole, and sought the possession and use of the church building and property then in the possession of the Whitmore faction, which was refused. On the 1st of August, 1888, a council of seven Baptist ministers assembled at Bonaparte, at the joint call of the two factions, and the following is the record of the matters to be submitted to it:

"The statement of reasons for calling the council was read by the minority, of which the following is a synopsis: '(1) That two brothers, William and Aura Smith, being professedly ministers of the gospel, came into our midst early in 1885, preaching the doctrine of entire sanctification and sinless perfection, inviting all professing Christians to seek this experience, and ridiculing Christians who failed to accept this invitation, and finally urging those who did accept this invitation to attend holiness prayer meetings. That Brother C. L. Custar, a former pastor of this Church, and several members of this Church followed after these Smith brothers, and accepted the aforesaid doctrine. (2) That Brother Custar taught this doctrine from the pulpit of this Church. That a holiness prayer meeting was organized in the spring of 1885, and carried on till May, 1888. That members of this Church professed entire sanctification, neglecting the regular meetings of this Church for holiness meetings. That this doctrine became a means of disturbance and alienation of feeling among the members. (3) That the teaching and acceptance of this false doctrine has been a cause of the difference of opinion and of the action of a minority in organizing the new body and claiming to be the real Bonaparte Baptist Church. [Signed] J. D. Israel and others.

"Reasons for calling a council were read on behalf of the majority party, of which the following is a copy: 'The Bonaparte Baptist Church organized the council to examine its faith and practice; its faith with reference to the doctrine of sanctification; its practice or discipline with regard to the exclusion of certain members of the church, who have since formed another organization, and claim to be the original and true Bonaparte Baptist Church. We want to know if we have so far departed from the faith once delivered to the saints that we can no longer be recognized as a regular missionary Baptist Church. We desire to know wherein we have wronged those whom we have excluded, that we may confess the same, and do all in our power to repair the broken walls of our beloved Zion. [Signed] H. A. Whitmore, C. L. Custar, Com.'

J. D. Israel and H. A. Whitmore as "leaders," and on behalf of their respective factions, signed the following: "For the sake of peace and harmony, and for the glory of our common Lord, it is hereby agreed that the findings and recommendations of this council shall be accepted as final, and in the fear of and by the help of God, we will carry them out in spirit as well as in letter. [Signed] J. D. Israel, H. A. Whitmore."

Each party selected a person to conduct the examinations in its behalf, and the record states that the examination was "thorough, satisfactory, and conducted in good spirit." Revs. Cole and Custar were appointed to receive the decision of the council "on behalf of their parties, respectively," and afterwards the council unanimously returned the following findings: "(1) We find that the doctrine of entire sanctification, taught by the Smith brothers, Miss Romack, and confessedly also by Bro. C. L. Custar, in the Church is not in harmony with the teachings of the Baptist denomination which deny instantaneous sanctification, the so-called second blessing, and sinless perfection. We hold to a true spirituality in our churches; to a high standard of Christian living; to progressive attainment.

and growth in grace. On the other hand, we hold that the doctrine of entire sanctification is subversive of the very end sought; destructive of the peace of our churches, in some instances destroying the churches themselves; and should be avoided as a deadly error. We are rejoiced at the noble stand taken by Bro. C. L. Custar in confessing his error in respect to this doctrine, and we trust that juster views of scripture teaching on this point may prevail in this Church and community. (2) The council recommend that the teaching of the above erroneous doctrine of second experience or entire sanctification be taught in this Church no more, forever; and that the teaching of it in this Church or permitting it to be taught in the Church is a just cause for church discipline. (3) We find that the exclusion of the three members of the choir was justifiable and regular, and we recommend to the young ladies that they make suitable acknowledgment to the Church. (4) We find that the exclusion of J. D. Israel, L. H. Mills, Jas. Murphy, Mrs. C. O. Troutman, and Mrs. J. W. Cox was hasty and unjustifiable. We recommend that the action of the Church in excluding them be at once rescinded."

At a regular meeting of the Church August 19, 1888 (both factions, as we understand), the decision of the council was on motion accepted, and the action of the Church in expelling J. D. Israel and others on the 4th of February was rescinded. At a meeting of the Church on the 10th of September, 1888, the Church annulled its action of August 19, and again, on the 3d of November, it took action on the findings of the council separately, and rejected numbers 1 and 2, being those with reference to the doctrine of sanctification. The petition recites the substance of the foregoing, and contains averments that the defendants and those associated with them have departed from the faith and practice of the Baptist Church, and are using the church building and records for the benefit and promotion of doctrines and a faith contrary to and in violation of the faith, covenants, and practice of the Baptist denominations, to maintain which the said Church was organized and the buildings erected. The relief sought is that the defendants be restrained from interfering with the plaintiff in the free use of the church buildings and property for their legitimate use as a place of worship and teaching the doctrines of the denomination.

The answer puts in issue the allegations of the petition that the defendants have departed from the faith and practice of the Baptist Church, and are using the church property or records for a purpose in violation of the teachings and doctrines of the denomination, and deny that the plaintiffs are denied the free use thereof for any legitimate purpose. The council found the doctrine of "entire sanctification," as taught by Smith brothers, was "not in harmony with the teachings of the Baptist denomination," but "subversive to the very end sought," and "destructive of the peace" of the churches. The correctness of this doctrine as a rule of faith and observance in the Baptist Church was in dispute between the factions. It was not, as indicated by appellees' argument, a question of the truth or falsity of the doctrine on scriptural authority, but was it in accord with, or subversive of, the covenants and practice of the Baptist Church, with the limitations imposed by its articles of association? This was a purely theological question, and a council of theologians from that church was a proper tribunal to determine such a question, and was so recognized and agreed upon by the parties. It is, however, contended by appellees that they are not bound by this finding of the council, and we notice their reasons, or at least some of them. Much stress is laid upon the fact that each Baptist society is an independent body, with no higher ecclesiastical authority for its control; that its form of government is congregational where a majority govern; and that it is within itself "a little republic." It should be in mind that it is the distinctive character of the Baptist Church government that is relied upon to make it an exception, and free it from the generally expressed rule of law, by which a minority of an association may claim its property against a majority seeking to divert it from its legitimate use. A quotation from appellees' argument will indicate clearly the objection to be met. It is said: "Yes, we repeat again if this Church or any other Baptist church desires to change its 'articles of faith' or belief, it may do so, if a majority of its members concur therein. If it desires to change to a Mormon church it may do so, and no person or persons, no man or body of men, either civil or ecclesiastical, has any right or power to interfere. It owes no allegiance to any man or body of men, except a majority of its own members. It has no creed except the Bible, and the right of its own members to interpret that according to the dictates of their own consciences. If a majority of the members of that Church believe the Bible to teach a certain doctrine, then that is 'Baptist doctrine,' because that Church has the right and the power to determine for itself what the Bible teaches, and no other church or churches has any right to interfere therein. The Baptists, as a denomination, have no creed. There is no such thing as a one Baptist church with one Baptist creed or belief. All there is of 'Baptist creed' consists in the right of each separate church to interpret the Scriptures for itself, and to say for itself what it believes the Scriptures to teach. There are as many 'Baptist churches' as there are several societies or congregations. There are as many 'Baptist denominations or creeds' as there are several societies or congregations which have given expression to their belief of what the Scriptures teach." Afterwards follows the conclusion: "We conclude, then, if there be a difference of opinion between the plaintiffs and defendants as to what the Bible teaches with reference to sanctification, and the defendants are in a majority and plaintiffs a minority, according to Baptist practice and usage there is but one remedy, namely, 'they may retire, and find a home in some other church; or they may organize themselves into a new one." This exclusiveness of government within the strict lines of ecclesiastical authority may be conceded; but we are constrained to doubt that any writer, either upon ecclesiastical or civil law, where a controversy involved the right of a minority of an association to have its property devoted to the purpose for which it was given or granted, has laid down a rule so broad. As we think these statements and the conclusion lay at the foundation of other errors into which appellees have fallen, a brief consideration of them, and some rules of law, will render a consideration of many questions unnecessary.

Let it be understood at the outset that we are not adjudicating the right of any person to a religious belief or practice, nor are we to determine the truth or falsity of the doctrine of "sanctification," or "sinless perfection." Upon authority so general as to be beyond question it is held that property given or set apart to a church or religious association, for its use in the enjoyment and promulgation of its adopted faith and teachings, is by said church or association held in trust for that purpose, and any member of the church or association, less than the whole, may not divest it therefrom. The following cases more or less directly sustain the rule, and are but a few of the many bearing on the question: Kniskern v. Lutheran Churches of St. John & St. Peter, 1 Sandf. Ch. 439, 7 L. ed. 388; Atty-Gen. v. Pearson, 3 Meriv. 353; Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 487; Stebbins v. Jennings, 10 Pick. 172; Hale v. Everett, 58 N. H. 9; Lawyer v. Cipperly, 7 Paige, 281, 4 L. ed. 156; Hartford First Bapt. Church v. Withereil, 8 Paige, 296, 3 L. ed. 159; Harrison v. Hoyle, 24 Ohio St. 254; Field v. Field, 9 Wend. 401; Gable v. Miller, 10 Paige, 627, 4 L. ed. 1118, 2 Denio, 492; Cincinnati M. E. Church v. Wood, 5 Ohio, 284; Happy v. Morton, 33 Ill. 398; Lawson v. Kolbenson, 61 Ill. 407; Dublin Case, 38 N. H. 459; Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666; Fadness v. Braunborg, 73 Wis. 257; First Constitutional Presby. Church v. Congregational Soc. 28 Iowa, 567.

The Mt. Zion Baptist Church came into possession and ownership of the property it now holds under a profession of faith and practice limited by the "articles of faith and church covenants published in the minutes of the Des Moines Baptist Association in the year 1848," which we understand to accord with the teachings of the Baptist denomination. These articles of faith and church covenants, and the teachings with which they accord, are a limitation on the trust or use to which the property may be applied. Nice distinctions or shades of opinion on doctrinal points or practice do not merit the interference of a court of equity, and it is only when the departure from the faith is so substantial as to amount to a diversion of the property from the trust purpose that courts will interfere. The council selected by the parties declared, in effect, the doctrines taught by Smith brothers to be a deadly error, and destructive of the peace of the Church. Treating this finding for the present as legitimate and true for the purposes of the case, and the situation is that property given and devoted to the promotion of the Baptist Church is being used for its destruction. Appellees' contention because of their claims for the distinctive or independent character of the Baptist Church by which a majority may, without limitation, govern, would permit this result. They take the Scriptures as the only limitation upon or authority over the power of the church, both as to spiritual and material affairs, within the church; and wherein the members may differ the majority control, without reference to the original purposes of their association. The error of appellees in their claim for the "independency" of the majority in a Baptist church lies in a mistaken conception of what should be understood by "government." The power of the majority to govern is derivative, and the source of derivation limits the power. The organization gave birth to the Church, and a power to govern the Church. The Church is Baptist because of the faith and covenants that make it so. It is not the faith and covenants that need or are to be governed, but the members in the enjoyment and fulfillment of the same. The power to govern the Church gives no power to change the Church or the faith and covenants that fix its character. The property of this Church is the common property of all its members, and each has such an interest therein that he may insist that it shall be devoted to the religious faith for which it was given. The manner of the application is delegated to the judgment of a majority of the members of the Church, but there is no delegation of authority to the majority to apply it to the advancement of a church of another faith by a direct transfer, or by changing the faith of a majority of the members of the Church. It is when such an attempt is made that a court of equity will interfere to protect the rights of a minority in having the trust property applied in accord with the original intent. In Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. 188, it is said: "When the founders or donors have clearly expressed their intention that a particular set of doctrines shall be taught, or a particular form of worship and government maintained, it is not in the power of individuals having the management of the institution at any time to alter the purpose for which it was founded." In the same case it is further said: "In church organizations those who adhere and submit to the regular order of the church, local and general, though a minority, are the true congregation." Roach's App. 69 Pa. 462; Rottmann v. Bartling, 22 Neb. 375.

If perchance a bare majority of some Baptist church should determine, on scriptural authority, their right to a plurality of wives, and, against the protests of a minority, devote the property of the church to the advocacy and practice of such a doctrine, under the claim of appellees that the church "owes no allegiance to any man or body of men," civil or ecclesiastical, except a majority of its members, the only redress of the minority would be to retire from the church, and leave the property to the majority for such a purpose. Such a surrender of civil rights is without support on any principle of natural justice, and we believe without the sanction of any judicial tribunal. We, of course, treat and understand the arguments and claims of parties as to the law to be applicable to the property interest of a church, for it is the only question involved in this suit.

It is said in Schnorr's Appeal, in a very similar connection, that "the guaranty of religious freedom has nothing to do with the property. It does not guarantee freedom to steal churches." The thought, with no intent or reason to impute a criminal or dishonest purpose in this case, is not without application to the marvelous freedom from interference claimed for a majority in a Baptist church, because of a congregational or independent form of government. It is further said in the same connection that such freedom "secures to individuals the right of withdrawing, forming a new society with such creed and government as they please, raising from their own means another fund, and building another house of worship; but it does not confer on them the right of taking the property consecrated to other uses by those who may now be sleeping in their graves."

Mt. Zion Baptist Church was organized in 1842, and prospered, without dissension, till 1885, when this new doctrine, which had not before been taught or recognized in the Church, was introduced. With its introduction began trouble, resulting in a division of the Church upon religious faith as justified by the Bible. Not alone the finding of the council, but the record on other grounds, leads to the conclusion that at the organization of the Church and long after it was not thought of as a doctrine of faith or belief in the Church. The newness and singularity of the doctrine in that Church and community seemed to render it one for especial teaching and information, leading to the holding of "holiness meetings," and the truth of such religious experience was in dispute among professing Christians, and especially in the Baptist Church. Copious citations from the Scriptures and from religious treatises are made in support of a doctrine of sanctification which it is neither our province to deny nor affirm. It is likely true that one purpose of these citations is to show that the sanctification, the teaching of which the council found to be a deadly error, was not that taught by defendants, but that it was a doctrine of sanctification in accord with the teaching of the Baptist Church, which fact will be hereafter noticed.

It is urged that the findings of the council are without force, and not binding upon the defendants or on this court, because the church knows no tribunal except the church itself, and hence the action of the council is void. But has not this independent body a right to act for itself,—to agree upon a lawful method of adjusting any differences it may have? Where is the power to gainsay its right to do so? We do not hold, for it is not our province, that for the purpose of church observance the findings of the council are obligatory. Such is purely a matter of ecclesiastical direction and authority; but the ecclesiastical question there determined, as to the fact of the doctrine taught by Smith brothers being error against the faith of the Church, we think is conclusively settled, and that it may be shown in the civil courts, in matters of which they take jurisdiction, when material to the question at issue. A reference to the reasons for calling the council shows this doctrinal question to have been in dispute, and the majority recognized itself as a party to a controversy on a doctrinal question, the settlement of which was for the "sake of peace and harmony, and for the glory of our common Lord." It was by common consent a method of settling the creed of the Church, and their acts in this respect, being of all the members, are as available in the civil courts to protect property rights as are their acts at the organization of the Church in fixing its creed and character. It will be observed that we are not holding that the recommendations of the council are of like effect, nor are we attaching legal signification to them. They do not go to the conditions that fix property rights with which we deal. After the majority has recognized itself a party to a controversy that should be settled in the interest of peace and harmony, the claim that it should itself sit in judgment to determine the controversy is somewhat novel. The minority lay at the door of the majority the charge of heresy. The majority say: "We constitute the Church. All power is vested in the Church, and hence in us. We determine that the charge is false." This is the precise claim made by appellees as to the power of a majority, and it is the precise action taken by appellees as a majority in Mt. Zion Baptist Church, after which the council was called, the action of which it would now repudiate. In view of this, the claim of the majority that "if it desires to change to a Mormon church it may do so, and no person or persons, no man or body of men, either civil or ecclesiastical, has any right or power to interfere," is not strange. The position leads to this: Consider the majority of a particular Baptist church as guilty of the grossest violations of and the widest departure from the church covenants and faith. Being accused by the minority, the accused sit in judgment, which it declares in its favor, and then pleads the judgment it declares as conclusive of its innocence, because no other man or body of men has authority to interfere. However such a rule may serve in purely ecclesiastical relations, we unhesitatingly say the civil law will not adhere to it where the result is to divert trust property from its proper channel.

But it is said the council did not find that defendants believed or taught the doctrine of sanctification as taught by Smith brothers, and it is true that it is not in terms so found, although the inference is quite conclusive. If it was so found, the same reasons would not exist for our treating it as conclusive as in case of the doctrinal point before discussed. The inquiry as to the conduct of the defendants involves that before and after the proceedings of the council, and becomes a fact for us to find from the evidence. The evidence, independent of the finding of the council as to the extent the doctrine was believed and taught except as to a few, including the pastor, who at or before the sitting of the council confessed his error, would leave us in serious doubt on this question but for what transpired after the sitting. On the 19th of August the Church (including the defendants) accepted the action of the council in pursuance of their agreement, and to this and the subsequent action of the Church we attach much importance in determining the fact. The council had only found that the particular doctrine of sanctification taught by Smith brothers was error, and the acceptance of the finding reached to no other doctrine. The recommendation that it be taught no more in the Church was only the "above erroneous doctrine." On the 10th of September the Church by action annulled its action of August 19, and again November 8, by further action, it rejected the action of the council as to said finding and recommendations, and accepted it in other respects. Thus it is seen that the majority organized as a church has in effect declared its adherence to the erroneous doctrine, and refused to abide by the recommendation that it should not be further taught in the Church. If the doctrine taught by Smith brothers was not that entertained by defendants, why reject the finding that it was error?" If it was not the intention to teach it in the Church, why reject the recommendation that it should not be further taught? This conduct of the majority, in the light of other facts, is quite conclusive, to our minds, of both its belief in the doctrine and its purpose to teach it in the Church. But as a reason for the action of the Church in repudiating the findings it is said: "The church had no right to sign the agreement, because it cannot delegate its authority, and the signing of the agreement was disloyalty to Christ, and a surrender of the cardinal principle of Baptist practice, namely, church independence." There is a seeming inconsistency between the language and conduct of the majority in this respect. The disloyalty to Christ appears to have been in making the agreement to abide by the action of the council, because of a surrender of principle. But the majority rejects part of the findings of the council and accepts other parts, one of which was favorable to it. We do not see how to sustain appellees' claim, except upon the theory that the disloyalty in making the agreement depended on the character of the findings under it, which we do not think would be claimed. It is again said: "For the defendants to have accepted these findings would have been for them to admit, not that they were teaching or intending to teach any such doctrine, but that C. L. Custar, their former pastor, to whom they had given a letter of recommendation to a sister church, had been teaching the doctrine of sinless perfection." But Rev. Custar was present at the meeting of August 19, when the church accepted the action of the council, and took his letter of dismission at that time, and took part in the proceeding, favoring the acceptance; and 18 L. R. A.

the findings, which he was a committee of the majority to receive, show that he had been confessedly a teacher of the same doctrines as Smith brothers, and confessed his error. How can we, in the light of such a record, accept the claim of the majority that in rejecting the finding and recommendation they were acting in the interest of the pastor? Other claims are made, as that the parties were by the council required to sign the agreement which was wrong, but nothing in the record shows but that it was not entirely voluntary as to all parties. It is further said that the action of a council is only advisory, and that it is never binding. The rule, as claimed, has the support of ecclesiastical authorities, but the agreement in this case made it more as to its effect on the property interests of the Church. It is a question entirely different from that pertaining to conscience, or the general rules for church government, as to which the authorities cited have especial reference. It should be kept in mind, to avoid misapprehension, that we have only treated the findings of the council as conclusive in so far as, by an agreement of the entire body of the Church, it determined a dispute as to its former faith or creed. We reach the conclusion upon the facts in the case that the majority have made a substantial departure from the original faith and covenants of the Church, and have diverted the property from the purpose for which it was given or granted.

In App. v. Lutheran Congregation, 6 Pa. 201, it is said: "It is the duty of the court to decide in favor of those, whether a minority or majority of the congregation, who are adhering to the doctrine professed by the congregation, and the form of worship in practice, as also in favor of the government of the church in operation, with which it was connected at the time the trust was declared." See also McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9; Sutter v. First Reformed Dutch Church, 42 Pa. 508.

In deciding who is entitled to control the Church property where there is such a division, we must look to the situation when the dispute began. In Roehl's Appeal, citing the above authorities, it is said: "The title to the church property of a divided congregation is in that part of it which is acting in harmony with its own law; and the ecclesiastical laws, usages, and principles which were accepted among them before the dispute began are the standard for determining which party is right."

Thus aided by authority upon the facts as we find them, we are not in doubt as to our duty. The minority, when pressed from the Church by the departure of the majority, having the church organization, were justified in taking measures by organization to preserve the identity of the Church and its property interests, and under the law were entitled to its use and control. It is only by placing it there that the trust will be observed, and the cause is remanded to the district court for a decree to that effect.

Reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Phæbe A. GREENE, Resp't.,

v.

Peter COUSE, Appt.

(.....N. Y.....)

A defendant in ejectment is not estopped to set up adverse possession by the fact that his grantor after setting up the same defense in a prior action had settled it by buying the plaintiff's title and giving his notes for the purchase price, and that the same plaintiff has brought a second action after a default in payment of the notes.

(Haight and Parker, JJ., dissent.)

(June 25, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Delaware County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. James R. Baumes, for appellant:

Alex. Couse having acquired the title in fee by adverse possession to the lot in question, could not impair or lose it by the contract relied on by plaintiff under the "Statute of Fraudulent Conveyances and Contracts Relating to Lands."

When a party shows he has a legal title to land, it cannot be taken from him by evidence that he has said he had no title to it.

A party in possession of lands may be permitted to protect himself against litigation by buying in claims made by others, without invalidating his legal rights or subjecting himself to any allegiance to others. By acknowledging the title of another he is not estopped from subsequently disclaiming holding under such title if the original entry was not under the person in whom the title is acknowledged; nor is any other person deriving the possession from such tenant estopped by such acknowledgment.

Defendant may interpose any equitable defense, such as an estoppel. See Miller v. Platt, 5 Duer, 272; Crary v. Goodman, 12 N. Y. 266; Chase v. Peck, 21 N. Y. 581.

But to avail himself of such defense, it must be pleaded. Raynor v. Timerson, 46 Barb. 518; Blair v. Claxton, 18 N. Y. 529.

The common-law rule excludes all defenses in ejectment, except those that are legal; and this rule is recognized in the federal courts. Singleton v. Touchard, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 342, 17 L. ed. 50; Robinson v. Campbell, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 212, 4 L. ed. 372.

But in various States equitable defenses may, under statutes, be made to the action; and not only may an equitable defense be set up, but equitable relief demanded on the part of the defendant, against the plaintiff. See Wait, Act. & Def. §§ 74, 88; Requa v. Holmes, 26 N. Y. 338; Smith v. Tome, 68 Pa. 158; Fisher v. Moolick, 13 Wis. 321; Hayden v. Stewart, 27 Mo. 286; Newsome v. Williams, 27 Ark. 632; Meador v. Parsons, 19 Cal. 294; Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 607.

In several States, by virtue of the statute, every defense, legal or equitable, may be proved under the general denial. Vanduyne v. Hepner, 45 Ind. 451, 589; Franklin v. Kelley, 2 Neb. 79, 113, 115, 13 L. R. A.

In some States the defense of the Statute of Limitations may even be relied upon in this action under a general denial. Nelson v. Brodhack, 44 Mo. 596; Bledsoe v. Simms, 53 Mo. 305, 307.

But it cannot be in other States, whose Codes expressly require the Statute to be pleaded. Orton v. Noonan, 25 Wis. 672.

An equitable defense to the action, must however, as it seems, be specially pleaded. Stewart v. Hoag, 12 Ohio St. 623; Lombard v. Cowham, 34 Wis. 486, 491.

Defendant in ejectment may successfully plead title acquired by adverse possession, fully matured after warrant and survey, but before patent issued to the warrantee, or those claiming under him, whether a patent has been subsequently granted or not. Patten v. Scott, 10 Cent. Rep. 727, 118 Pa. 115.

It is not indispensable that the plaintiff in an action of ejectment should show a perfect indefeasible estate in fee simple, to authorize a recovery against one who can establish no legal right either of property or possession. Lewis v. Goguette, 3 Stew. & P. 184.

But possession should not be ousted without a clear title in the other party, especially when it has been upheld by the state tribunals. Preston v. Bowmar, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 580, 5 L. ed. 336.

And a plaintiff in ejectment who has no title whatever cannot recover, though he sue for the use and benefit of another who has the title. Brooking v. Dearmond, 27 Ga. 58.

But a defendant in ejectment who shows no title to the lands in dispute cannot take advantage of technical imperfections in the plaintiff's title (Mo-Allister v. Williams, 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 107; Zeringue

An offer to buy out a hostile claim will not estop the party making such offer from asserting title by adverse possession previously acquired.

The agreement of March 5 was rescinded long before the commencement of the action.

The Bradstreets refused to convey according to its terms, and such refusal gave Couse the right to assent to the rescission and to treat the agreement as abandoned.

Hubbell v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 73, 100 N. Y. 47; Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 107, 114, 115; Morange v. Morris, 3 Keyes, 48; Graves v. White, 87 N. The rule in such event would be to restore the respective parties to their rights as they existed prior to the making of the contract.

v. Williams, 15 La. Ann. 76; and when the plaintiff in ejectment shows a connection between his title and the title of the person in whose name he sues, it will be considered that he is authorized to use the name of the latter in the action. Adams v. McDonald, 29 Ga. 571.

Of course, it cannot avail the plaintiff anything to show that some third person has a better right to the premises in dispute than the defendant, unless he can connect himself in some way with the title of such third person; and the same rule will apply to the defendant in an action of ejectment. See Bailey v. March, 3 N. H. 274; Enfield Props. v. Permit, 3 N. H. 512; Tyler, Ejectment and Adverse Possession, chap. 4, p. 74.

As the law now stands any equitable defense may be interposed in a proceeding at law to recover the possession of real estate. Not only so, but in actions strictly legal, the defendant may have positive or affirmative relief for matter purely equitable, in a case properly stated, by way of a counter-claim or cross-demand. Rozier v. Van Dam, 16 Iowa, 175, 178.

The general doctrine in actions of ejectment is that the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title and cannot rely upon the weakness of the defendant's claim. And if the case depends upon the legal title, the defendant may show an outstanding title in some third party, and need not show that he holds it himself or that his possession relates to it; but it must usually appear in such a case that this outstanding title existed at the time of the commencement of the suit, and was one on which the holder could recover, if he assert his right under it. Love v. Simms, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 18 L. R. A.

Battle v. Rochester City Bank, 3 N. Y. 88, 91; Harris v. Hiscock, 91 N. Y. 845.

Messrs. W. & G. W. Youmans, for respondent:

One who has recognized the title of plaintiff, by offering to purchase of him, cannot set up adverse possession.

Jackson v. Britton, 4 Wend. 507.

An offer to purchase lands by a party having the title does not impair or affect his right. Such offer, however, by a party bars the defense of adverse possession.

Ibid. See Jackson v. Croy, 12 Johns. 427; Jackson v. Cuerden, 2 Johns. Cas. 353.

As the plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, it logically follows that the defendant may resist his suit by any title, either held by himself or outstanding, which will show that the plaintiff lacks an element which is essential to his right to recover.

Green v. Scarlett, 3 Grant, Cas. 228; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 109, and cases there cited.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is ejectment, and was brought to recover possession of an undivided one-twelfth part of the premises described in the complaint. The answer was a denial of the complaint; also title in the defendant; also title in the defendant arising from adverse possession of the premises for more than twenty years and a counter-claim. The premises as claimed in the complaint consist of 100 acres in the N. W. corner of the E. ¼ of Great lot No. 24, Evans' Patent, in Delaware County. It was stipulated by the defendant, for the purposes of this appeal, that the plaintiff showed title in herself as one of the heirs-at-law of Martha Bradstreet, de-

Blood*, 36 Vt. 273; Field, Lawyer's Briefs, § 44.

Adverse possession is made out by the co-existence of two distinct ingredients: the first, such a title as will afford color; and, second, such possession under it as will be adverse to the right of the true owner; and whether these two essentials exist is, in all cases, a question of law, to be determined by the court, though the facts upon which they are founded are for the finding of the jury. Baker v. Swan, 32 Md. 355; Dixon v. Cook, 47 Miss. 220. See Washburn v. Cutter, 17 Minn. 361.

To determine what acts are sufficient to constitute an adverse possession, attention should be given to the character of the property, to discover the object of owning it, and the uses to which it would ordinarily be applied, that the mind with which it was possessed, as well as the mind with which such possession was acquiesced in, may be the better understood. Corning v. Troy I. & N. Factory, 44 N. Y. 577; 6 Wait, Act. & Def. 437. See notes to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Houghton (Ill.) 1 L. R. A. 213; Gage v. Hampton (Ill.) 2 L. R. A. 512; *Erck v. ceased, to an undivided one twelfth of the premises in question, except as such title may have been defeated by the adverse holding of the defendant herein, and his predecessors, or parted with by force of the agreement of date March 5, 1875, hereinafter set forth. The plaintiff proved and read in evidence an instrument of which the following is a copy: "Received from A. Couse his note of $400 for the purchase price, with costs of suits, of an undivided two-thirds interest in 100 acres in the northwest corner of Great lot 24, Evans' Patent, known as the 'Wild Lot,' and being the same premises claimed to have been occupied by the said Couse for some years past; and I agree to forward to said Couse by mail, within ten days, a deed therefor. W. Youmans, Attorney for Bradstreet Heirs. Dated Delhi, N. Y., March 5, 1875,"—proved that the land therein mentioned was that in dispute; also gave evidence that the note had not been paid, and the recovery of a judgment upon the note which had not been paid. The defendant examined his grantor at considerable length to prove the defense of adverse possession of the premises, and that the defendant entered into the possession under a deed from his father, Alexander Couse, in 1882, who entered into the possession of the premises in 1849, under a deed from his father, Peter Couse, Sr., who some years before entered into possession under a written title from Joseph Nutter, and that such occupation had been continuous for over forty years, and none of the occupants had entered into possession under plaintiff, or anyone from whom plaintiff derived title, and was proceeding with the examination of other witnesses upon that subject, when the court ruled as follows:

"The Court. I think I must stop this evidence. You must make some other defense than the Statute of Limitations, or I must direct a verdict against you. The more I think of this question, the more I think the Statute of Limitations cannot prevail here." Defendant's counsel duly excepted to such ruling and decisions. "The court rules that under the contract of March 5, 1875, and the note of $400 given therefor, and the various stipulations and contracts in connection with that, this defendant has lost his right to avail himself of the adverse possession of himself and of his predecessors, and declines to receive any further evidence of occupation and of adverse possession by the defendant and his predecessors." To which ruling and decision the defendant's counsel duly excepted.

After some additional evidence upon the part of the plaintiff in relation to a subsequent arrangement as to the time and condition of delivery of the deed and payment of the purchase price the court directed a verdict for plaintiff, to which defendant excepted. When the defendant was thus precluded from giving further evidence on the subject, that already given tended to prove title by adverse possession in the defendant's grantor at the time such instrument of March 5, 1875, was made. And there was presented a question of fact for the jury in that respect; and title so established may be as effectual as that created in any other manner for the purposes of remedy or defense founded upon it. Barnes v. Light, 116 N. Y. 34, and cases there cited. Upon this state of facts the question is presented whether the defendant should have been precluded or estopped from proving the defense of title to the premises by adverse possession. The plaintiff and Alexander Couse, at the time such contract was made, respectively claimed to be the owner of the premises; and for the purposes of the question it may here be assumed that Alexander Couse and his grantor had been in the actual and continuous possession of the premises for forty or more years, and the plaintiff, and those under whom she claimed, had not during that period, if ever, been in the actual possession, and that the said defendant, nor any of his grantors, had ever entered into or retained possession of the premises with any permission of or privity with the plaintiff or her predecessors in title. In the absence of any of these relations the defendant and his grantors owed no duty or obligation to the plaintiff, and was therefore at liberty to fortify his title or purchase peace at any price and of whomsoever he chose. If, however, the adverse possession of the defendant's grantor, and those under whom he entered and claimed, had not ripened into a title at the time the contract of March, 1875, was made, the right to assert the continuance thereafter of such possession to perfect and support title as against the plaintiff would have been defeated by it. I am aware of the rule that where a lessee or vendee enters into possession of premises under a lease or contract he cannot, while he remains in possession, dispute the title of the lessor or vendor, but this case is lacking in the essential element which creates such estoppel. Neither the defendant nor his grantors entered into the possession by any manner of consent or contractual relation with the plaintiff or her ancestors or grantors. The rule in relation to estoppel does not apply "where, at the time of the purchase, the vendee is in as owner, claiming title, and his entry was not under the vendor." Glen v. Gibson, 9 Barb. 634-640.

Where a man is in possession of land as owner, having title, he is at liberty to purchase the land over again as often as claimants shall appear who are not in possession, and thus quiet such claims and fortify his title, without being estopped from disputing the title of such subsequent vendors, should it afterwards become necessary for him to do so." Jackson v. Leek, 12 Wend. 105; Bain v. Matteson, 54 N. Y. 666. Even in a consummated purchase the grantee in fee may purchase in an outstanding title hostile to his grantor, and fortify his own defective title. Kenada v. Gurdner, 3 Barb. 589. In Watkins v. Holman, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 54, 10 L. ed. 885, it is said by the court in discussing such relations that "the relation of landlord and tenant in no sense exists between vendor and vendee." Judge Bronson, in delivering the opinion of the court in Osterhout v. Shoemaker, 3 Hill, 513-518, says: "The grantee takes the land to hold for himself, and to dispose of it at his pleasure. He owes no faith or allegiance to the grantor, and he does him no wrong when he treats him as an utter stranger to the title."

These views lead to the conclusion that the exceptions before mentioned were well taken, and require a new trial.

Judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Haight, J., dissenting:

This is an action of ejectment to recover an undivided one-twelfth part of the lands described in the complaint. The defense is adverse possession. It appears by the stipulation of the parties that "the plaintiff showed title in herself, as one of the heirs-at-law of Martha Bradstreet, deceased, to an undivided one twelfth of the premises in question except as such title may have been defeated by the adverse holding of the defendant herein and his predecessors, or parted with by force of an agreement between W. Youmans, attorney for the Bradstreet heirs, and Alexander Couse, dated March 5, 1875." It appears that on the 2d day of January, 1874, one Alexander Couse was in possession of the lands in question, and that on that day the plaintiff, with others, known as the "Bradstreet heirs," brought actions through W. Youmans, their attorney, against him, in ejectment, for the lands in question; that thereafter, and on the 5th day of March, 1875, an agreement was entered into between the parties, by which the actions were settled and discontinued, he agreeing to purchase the interests of the plaintiffs in the premises at a stipulated price, giving his note therefor, and they agreeing to deliver him a deed therefor within ten days. This agreement was subsequently modified so as to provide that the deed should be delivered upon the payment of the note. The note, although long past due, has never been paid. It further appears that on the 7th day of February, 1882, Alexander Couse quitclaimed the lands in question to his son, the defendant in this action, who thereupon entered into possession, and now claims to hold the same adversely to the plaintiff. The question thus presented for review is as to whether he can avail himself of that defense.

I shall not question the doctrine that one holding adversely, and defending upon that ground, may purchase of a third person an outstanding title to support his own, whether he doubts the validity of his previous title or not, and that such purchase will not affect his right to defend under his claim of adverse possession. But a very different question is presented by the facts under consideration. As we have seen, the plaintiff's record title is conceded. In 1874 she brought an action in ejectment to recover the possession of the premises, or of her interest therein, and that action was settled and discontinued, the defendant therein agreeing to purchase her interest in the premises. By such settlement and agreement the defendant in that action not only admitted and recognized her title and right to recover, but also waived his right or claim of adverse possession, and his possession in the premises thereafter must be deemed to be under the contract of purchase. By such agreement the plaintiff was induced to discontinue her action, and thus forego the establishing of her title by judicial decree. This action was brought eight years afterwards, and if the defendant is now permitted to avail himself of the defense of adverse possession he may now be able to prove and establish that which he could not have done eight years ago. He may thus be permitted to establish a defense, in consequence of the agreement and a breach thereof, which could not have been maintained had the settlement and agreement not been made. This cannot be allowed under the well-settled principles of estoppel. The agreement placed the plaintiff in a position where she could not maintain an action to oust the defendant's grantor until he had made a breach in his contract to purchase. The defendant gets no greater or better title than his father had, and if the defense was not available to the father it would not be to the son. There is no claim of fraud or deception in making the contract.

Sedgwick & Wait, in their treatise on "Trial of Title to Lands," at section 817, say: "When a person in possession of lands covenants with another to pay him for the land, he thereby acknowledges the title of the vendor, and is estopped from setting up an outstanding title or title in himself unless he can show that he was deceived or imposed upon in making the agreement."

In Jackson v. Ayers, 14 Johns. 224, where the defendant was in possession of land, and had agreed with the plaintiff to purchase and pay him therefor, it was held in a subsequent action of ejectment that the defendant was estopped from setting up a title by adverse possession in himself. In the case of Jackson v. Britton, 4 Wend. 507, it was held that, while an offer to purchase land by a party having title does not impair or affect his right, it, however, bars the defense of adverse possession. In Corning v. Troy I. & N. Factory, 84 Barb. 485-489, Hogeboom, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Nor could they during the same period continue an adverse possession previously commenced. By taking a lease from the De Freests they acknowledged their title and right to convey. They held under this title, and recognized it as the true title. They must be deemed to have waived any previous imperfect rights which they had already acquired under a prior incipient adverse possession. The doctrine of cumulative disabilities does not apply. The defendants are prevented from setting up during this period an adverse possession, not for the reason that they could not purchase an outstanding title for the purpose of perfecting their right or quieting their possession, but because by taking a lease from the De Freests they have placed the latter under a disability, in a position where they cannot take proceedings to oust the defendants, and of course where the Statute of Limitations should not be permitted to run against them. It would seem, therefore, entirely clear that, as this lease did not expire until 1852, the defendants cannot avail themselves of the defense of adverse possession." In Jackson v. Cueden, 2 Johns. Cas. 353, the defendant wrote a letter to one Mary Clark the plaintiff's lessor, in which he offered to purchase of her lands of which he was then in possession. Subsequently, and in an action of ejectment, he offered to give evidence of more than twenty years' adverse possession in himself. This was excluded by the trial judge. On review it was held that the letter of the defendant was sufficient prima facie for the plaintiff to recover; that while the defendant was not precluded from showing that he grounded his letter on a mistake, he was precluded from setting up adverse possession or the Statute of Limitations; that the acknowledgment in his letter takes away the Statute. See also Jackson v. Spear, 7 Wend. 401; Fosgate v. Herkimer Mfg. & Hydraulic Co. 12 Barb. 352-356; Tompkins v. Snow, 63 Barb. 525-533; Jackson v. Walker, 7 Cow. 637-642; Sayles v. Smith, 12 Wend. 57; Ingraham v. Baldwin, 9 N. Y. 45-47; Smith v. Babcock, 36 N. Y. 167, 168; McMath v.

Teel, 64 Ga. 595; Garlington v. Copeland, 32 S. C. 57-67; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 32, title, Estoppel.

As we have seen, the suits were settled and discontinued, and this furnished a good consideration for the agreement which thenceforth became binding upon the parties. Their rights were fixed by it, and the party in default cannot now go back and litigate questions that were disposed of in the settlement. Again, it appears that an action was brought upon the note given by Alexander Couse, and that he interposed the defense that it was given for the purchase price of the lands in question, and that the plaintiff had committed a breach of the contract in failing to deliver the deed in accordance with the terms of the contract. Upon this issue the plaintiff had judgment, thus forever disposing of the facts that the contract of purchase was made, and that there was no breach thereof on the part of the plaintiff. The judgment should be affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Samuel P. DAVIS, Appt.,

TOWN OF SEYMOUR.

(50 Conn. 581.)

1. Claims in different counts against a town for injuries to sheep under Gen. Stat., § 3752, not being based on contract, cannot be united to make up the amount necessary to give jurisdiction to the court of common pleas.
2. A mere statutory obligation to pay money does not raise an implied contract to pay it. The liability depends on the statute itself.

(December 15, 1890.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for New Haven County erasing from the docket his action brought to recover compensation for sheep which had been killed by dogs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Verrenice Munger, for appellant:

Section 812, Gen. Stat., permits the adding together of the different claims in case of implied contracts. Wherever, therefore, the law will imply a contract to pay a sum of money then this Statute applies.

Section 3752 creates the liability to pay certain sums of money. When the exact amount has been ascertained in the way pointed out by the Statute then the law implies a promise to pay it.

Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 512, p. 552; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 886.

An implied contract is co-ordinate with duty, and whenever it is certain that a man ought to do a particular thing the law supposes him to do that thing.

Anderson, Law Dict. pp. 86, 248, 527; 2 Bl. Com. 159; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 373.

Where it is the duty of a defendant to do an act, the law implies a promise to fulfill it.

A liability imposed by statute is no greater than a common-law liability. In either case the duty to discharge it is the same. When, therefore, the Statute creates a debt, or gives to a party the right to demand from another a sum of money, the law raises an implied promise to pay it.

See 1 Comyn, Dig. p. 187.

The Statute in question does not provide a remedy to enforce the liability created by it. Under such circumstances the common law provides the remedy.

Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 13 Conn. 517; 1 Swift, Dig. *585.

If no form of action is prescribed by the Statute, debt is the proper remedy. In this State, in such cases, an action, called an action on the Statute, will also lie.

1 Swift, Dig. *585, 586.

At common law debt would lie to recover money due, "upon simple contracts, express or implied, whether verbal or written, and upon contracts under seal; or of record, and on statutes by a party aggrieved."

If debt would lie, so would assumpsit.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to the Court of Common Pleas in New Haven County, under Gen. Stat., § 3752.* The complaint contains three counts. The first one alleges that on a day named certain sheep of the plaintiff, worth $12, were killed by dogs within the Town of Seymour, and that he gave notice, and afterwards proved to the satisfaction of the selectmen, that the damage done to them thereby was $12; and the count concludes "that, by force of the Statute in such case made and provided, said Town became liable to pay to the plaintiff and a right of action had accrued to the plaintiff to recover from said Town, the amount of said damage." The second and third counts are in form exactly like the first. The second alleges a killing of sheep on another day, and that the damage was $77. The third alleges a killing on still another day, and lays the damage at $24. The complaint claims damages to the amount of $150. The court of common pleas has jurisdiction only when the demand exceeds $100. On motion by the defendant that court erased the case from the docket for want of jurisdiction, and the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

It was decided in Denison v. Denison, 16 Conn. 38, that the combining of the claims in several counts would not give jurisdiction to a court, where the claim in the separate counts, taken each by itself, was not sufficient for that purpose. This ruling has been followed in numerous cases since, among which are Nichols v. Hastings, 35 Conn. 546; Hunt v. Rockwell, 41 Conn. 51, and Camp v. Stevens, 45 Conn. 92. The plaintiff does not deny the force of these decisions, but he seeks to avoid their application to this case. He says that each of the counts in the complaint sets forth facts from which the law implies a contract, and that any number of contracts may be joined, and the amounts claimed in all may be added together, for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction. Gen. Stat. § 812. If the plaintiff when he brought the action believed as he now professes to believe, it is somewhat singular that he did not frame his complaint accordingly. The complaint declares that the Town is liable by direct force of the Statute, and says nothing about any contract. But does the law imply a contract from the facts stated in any of the counts? A contract is a promise made on a consideration. Without a consideration there can be no contract, express or implied. There must be a subject matter in respect to which there has been a meeting of the minds of the parties. A contract involves an offer and an acceptance. One party expresses his readiness to be bound to the performance of something concerning the subject matter, and the other party expresses his acceptance of that readiness. This is the meeting of their minds which is essential to the making of a contract. Where there is a consideration, such offer and acceptance is a contract. It is true that many times there is such a condition of facts that the law will imply, sometimes an offer by one party and sometimes the acceptance by the other, and so supply an element necessary to the completion of a contract which otherwise might be wanting.

The expression "implied contract" is perhaps open to objection, in that it seems to admit that an entire contract in all its parts may be implied. The parties to a contract can never be implied, nor the subject matter, nor the consideration. These must be shown. But the promise which is necessary to complete a contract may be implied. Thus in 1 Swift, Dig. p. 182, it is said: "The term 'implied contract' is generally used to denote a promise which the law, from the existence of certain facts, presumes that a party has made." And at page 397 the cases in which the law implies a promise are brought together and arranged under six heads. The sixth is, "where a liability to indemnify is imposed by statute." The plaintiff claims that, wherever a statute or the common law imposes a duty or an obligation to pay money, there the law implies a promise to perform that duty or pay that money. This claim cannot be maintained. Neither a statute nor a rule of law alone raises an implied promise. There must always be the fact of a consideration outside of and in addition to the Statute or the rule of law; and the promise is implied rather from the consideration than from the Statute. The Statute or the rule establishes the duty, but the consideration raises the implied promise to perform that duty. The authorities cited by the plaintiff illustrate this perfectly. Take the citation from Pomeroy, Remedies and Rem. Rights, § 513. The example there given is from Metcalf on Contracts, and is as follows: "A husband is bound to support his wife, and if he wrongfully discards her any person may furnish support to her, and recover pay therefor from the husband. In an action of assumpsit, the furnishing of the support must be alleged to have been by the plaintiff at the request of the husband, and a promise by the husband must also be alleged. But proof of the actual facts supports both the allegations. The husband, being by law liable to pay, is held to have made both the request and the promise." pp. 203, 204. The furnishing the supplies to the wife is the consideration from which the law raises the promise to perform the legal duty. The citation from 1 Swift, Dig. 397, is to the same effect. It is that where an indemnity is imposed by a statute there the law implies a promise. The example that explains this rule is given at page 488, that "it is the foundation of suits brought by one town against another, or by an individual against a town, to recover expenses incurred in the support of a pauper." The support of the pauper is the consideration. Where one town has been compelled to expend money in the necessary support of a pauper who belongs to another town, there is an implied promise by the latter town to pay the former one, because the former has paid money which the latter ought to have paid. To be sure, without the Statute there would be no duty to perform. But the existence of a duty does not of itself raise any implied promise to perform it. There being a consideration for a promise in addition to the duty, the conditions exist from which the law presumes a promise to have been made. If the law implies a promise from a statute liability alone, to whom is such promise made? Who can sue upon it? The law requires a husband to support his wife. If he wrongfully discards her, is there an implied promise to her? Could she bring a suit? Each town is required by statute to support its paupers. A is a pauper belonging to the Town of Seymour. Is there an implied promise to A? Could he sue the Town? If he could not, who could? Take another case. A statute says that every person who steals the property of another shall pay the owner treble its value. Suppose the plaintiff's sheep had been stolen, and he should bring an action for the treble value. Would he, or could he, sue on an implied promise?" Or suppose that the thief had been sentenced to pay a fine; that would be a statute liability of the most emphatic kind. Is it so that there is an implied contract on the part of the thief to pay the amount of the fine? Questions of this kind might be multiplied. But these are sufficient to show that the plaintiff's contention cannot be sustained. In the present case the Town is liable, if liable at all, by the direct force of the Statute. The elements of a contract are not set forth in the complaint, and do not exist in the case.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

The other Judges concurred.

v.

John F. SLAUGHTER, Admr., etc., of Samuel Garland, Sr., Deceased, et al.

1. A gift by will of the use of the profits of a plantation to a person "under his superintendence," but not to be "bound for his past debts or for future debts and liabilities other than decent and comfortable support," does not give him any absolute property in the profits, but he holds them as trustee for the remaindermen except as to what he needs for "decent and comfortable support;" therefore such profits cannot be reached by his creditors.

2. A valid trust for the support of a person may be created which shall be free from his debts and liabilities.

NOTE.—Creator of estate may qualify its enjoyment by annexing conditions and limitations.

A testator is under no obligation to provide for payment of the debts of devisee; he may condition his bounty as suits himself, if he violates no rule of law. He may provide that the estate shall cease upon bankruptcy of the donee, or upon filing of a creditor's suit to subject the estate to the debt of the first donee. Bramhall v. Ferris, 14 N. Y. 41.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for the City of Lynchburg in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to recover the amount alleged to be due from Burr Garland, deceased, to the estate of Samuel Garland, Sr., deceased, out of the surplus profits of an estate in which Burr Garland had an interest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William J. Robertson and Edward S. Brown for appellants.

Mr. E. C. Burke, for appellee:

If the intention of the testator was to bequeath by way of remainder to Mrs. Morris and her children what of the profits of the estate had not been expended by B. Garland for his support, such bequest would be void for uncertainty.

The doctrine of Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. Jr. 483, that "if property is given to a man for his life the donor cannot take away the incidents of a life estate" (alienability being one of the incidents), is the firmly established English doctrine; and the same doctrine prevails in all of our States, except two, in which the question has been decided.

The doctrine has been recognized in Virginia.

An interest in property held in trust for a person during life, under a will providing that no part of it shall be assignable or in any way liable to be taken for his debts, is not property which can lawfully be sold, assigned or conveyed, or be taken on execution. Billings v. Marsh (Mass.) 10 L. R. A. 764.

A clause in a will diverting property upon alienation alone will embrace only the voluntary acts of the party, and will not apply to transfers by operation of law, as by bankruptcy. *Lear v. If a fund is devised to trustees with directions to pay the income to testator's son during his life, free from the claims of creditors, income which accrues prior to a decision of the court of last resort authorizing its application to his debts, does not apply to debts which accrue after such decision. Bull v. Kentucky Nat. Bank (Ky.) 12 L. R. A. 37.

If there is a clause against anticipation, an assignment of arrears already accrued and not of future income is good. Re Stulz's Trusts, 4 DeG. M. & G. 404.

B. Garland's power of disposal, as to all the profits, was ample and absolute, so that if testator had intended and attempted to convey the surplus, not used and consumed by him, to Mrs. Morris, etc., it would have been clearly void.

Hinton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the sequel to the case of Garland v. Garland, reported in 84 Va. 181.

As the case was then presented, it appeared that Wm. H. Garland, executor of Burr Garland, deceased, had brought a suit in the proper court in Mississippi to settle the administration accounts of his testator as administrator c. t. a. of Samuel Garland, Sr., deceased; that the court in Mississippi ascertained the amount due to be $64,130.88, and decreed that the domiciliary executor, the said Wm. H. Garland, should pay the same to John F. Slaughter, who had qualified in Virginia as administrator de bonis non, c. t. a., of the said Samuel Garland, Sr. Burr Garland died in Virginia in December, 1869. On his death there was found in the hands of John T. Merrell, in Lynchburg, Va., the sum of $1,421.52, which was the remains of a sum of money said Burr Garland had deposited with him on call, and subject to his (Burr Garland's) order. It also appeared that when Burr Garland died he was in possession of certain conveyances or assignments to himself from several legatees of the said signment of arrears already accrued and not of future income is good. Re Stulz's Trusts, 4 DeG. M. & G. 404.

A declaration in a will establishing a trust fund the income to be paid annually to a person for life, and not to be subject to the debts of the beneficiary, will not take it out of a statute making trust estates subject to the debts of the beneficiary, where the beneficiary is given power to dispose of the principal by will. Haycraft v. Bland (Ky.) 9 L. R. A. 599.

Where a will gives a beneficiary an unrestricted interest in the income of a fund during his life, he may, in the absence of statutory prohibition, alienate as a whole or in part, before the time fixed for its payment. Caldwell v. Boyd, 7 West. Rep. 403, 109 Ind. 447; Martin v. Davis, 82 Ind. 38; Wood v. Wallace, 24 Ind. 226; Farmers & M. Sav. Bank v. Brewer, 27 Conn. 600; Perry, Tr. 839; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 974, 1044.

Trustees may be clothed with discretion.

A will devising property in trust to pay such part of the proceeds to another as in the discretion of the trustee he may think best, does not vest in the beneficiary such an estate as may be subjected to the payment of his debts. Marshall v. Rash, 87 Ky. 116; White v. Thomas, 8 Bush, 662; Davidson v. Kemper, 79 Ky. 5.

The trustees may be clothed with a discretion as to the amount of income which they shall apply to the use of the beneficiary. Keyser v. Mitchell, 87 Pa. 473; Rife v. Geyer, 59 Pa. 968; Shryock v. Waggoner, 28 Pa. 430; Brown v. Williamson, 36 Pa. 388; Eyrick v. Hetrick, 13 Pa. 488; Shankland's App. 47 Pa. 113; *Girard L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Samuel Garland, Sr., who were children of Nicholas Garland, a brother of the testator, of the legacies given to them in the will of Samuel Garland, Sr. Slaughter being unable, by reason of Burr Garland's insolvency, to make the money decreed by the Mississippi court in that State, and, finding these assets in Virginia, brought suit in Virginia to enforce the Mississippi decree. To that suit Charles Y. Morris, administrator with the will annexed of Burr Garland, deceased, and Mary Garland, his surety, were made defendants.

Upon this state of facts, this court held that the decree of the Mississippi court must be accepted as final and conclusive evidence of the fact and amount of indebtedness by Burr Garland, the Mississippi administrator of Samuel Garland, to Samuel Garland's estate. And further, that the decree of that court did not undertake to distribute it, nor to decree who are entitled to receive it under Samuel Garland's will, but decreed it to be paid over to the Virginia domiciliary executor, to be by him distributed to those entitled, according to the declared intention of the testator; "but this decision is without prejudice to any right of action which Paulina B. Morris may have in this or in an independent suit." When the case got back to the circuit court the plaintiff filed his amended bill, making Paulina B. Morris and her children parties.

After the case had been matured for hearing, on application for an order directing accounts, the court proceeded to construe the ninth clause of the will of Samuel Garland, Sr., upon the true construction of which the present controversy must turn.

That clause is in these words:

"9th. My favorite brother, B. Garland, raised by me, and long a resident of Mississippi, is, and has for a long time past been, embarrassed in debt by losses of trade in 1837, and liabilities as surety for others. It might be unsafe to devise property to him absolutely. I therefore set apart in trust in the hands of my executor, for the benefit of my said brother, either of my plantations in Hinds County, called 'Barrens' or 'Tudor Hall,' whichever he may choose, and forty slaves in families—say about twenty-five hands, balance heads of families, children, and house servants—to be selected out of the stocks in both places; mules, horses, stock, etc., sufficient for the cultivation of the place so selected by him, with provisions, house and kitchen furniture, plantation tools, etc., oxen, hogs, etc., to make a complete estate. The profits of the estate is set apart for his (B. Garland's) use, under his superintendence. But neither the estate nor profits shall be bound for his past debts or for future debts and liabilities, other than decent and comfortable support. At his death all the property in this clause is to pass to Charles Y. Morris, in trust, to the separate use of his wife, Paulina B. Morris, and her children."

The circuit court was of opinion, and decreed, "that the estate of the said Burr Garland, in the profits set apart by the said clause for the use of the said Burr Garland, became and was, under the law, and by virtue of said will, his absolute estate, and, as such, liable not only for such debts as might be contracted for his decent and comfortable support, but for all his debts; and the said profits did not, nor did any part thereof, pass under the said will to the said Charles Y. Morris, in trust, for the separate use of the said Paulina B. Morris and her children, nor did they, or either of them, acquire any estate or interest therein under the said will."

This, however, is not, in our opinion, the interpretation to be put upon the clause of the will now under review. Burr Garland, as the very first words of this clause of the will say, was the favorite brother of the testator, by whom he had been reared. He had become so involved in debt, by reason of losses in business, doubtless occasioned by the financial panic of 1837, and by liabilities incurred as surety for others, that it appeared to the testator practically impossible for him ever to free himself from this load of debt.

In this condition the testator saw that an absolute gift or devise of property to him would be of no service to him, but would, in effect, be a gift of so much property to his creditors, who had not the slightest claim upon the testator. He therefore endeavored, by a carefully devised trust, to protect his brother in his declining years from penury and want, by giving him the mere right to "a decent and comfortable support" out of the profits of an estate, the legal title to which, as well as to the profits, he is careful to confer upon the trustee. And, having made this provision for his brother—a provision strictly limited to the use of so much of the profits as was necessary for "a decent and comfortable support"—and having declared that neither the estate nor profits shall be bound for his past debts or liabilities, or for future debts incurred on any other account, he gives all the property in this clause (clearly meaning the estate and any surplus profits) over to Charles Y. Morris, in trust, to the separate use of his wife, Paulina B. Morris, and her children.

Now, this being the purpose of the testator, too clearly manifested to require any verbal criticism upon the mere words of the will, the only remaining inquiry is, whether this intention shall be allowed to prevail or, to express the same idea differently, whether there is any rule of the court of chancery in this State which defeats it.

On behalf of the appellees, it is insisted that the testator, by his will, gave to Burr Garland the profits therein mentioned absolutely, and that the exemption of the profits from liability for Burr Garland's debts is void, because they say that it is a fundamental doctrine of the English chancery, and that the same rule prevails in America, that no such estate can be deprived of the incident of alienability or liability for the debts of the owner.

But this argument seems to me to be beside the mark. In this case the devisee and legatee, Burr Garland, did not take any absolute property in the profits of the estate which he might have assigned or aliened; but, on the contrary, he acquired the mere, although exclusive, right to a preception of so much of said profits as would furnish a decent and comfortable support for himself, and this was so qualified and limited as to fence out all his creditors except those who furnished him supplies for his support. Had he undertaken to expend these profits in any other way he would have been guilty of a breach of trust, for there was in the eye of a court of equity as complete a trust in him to apply these profits in this one direction as there was in the trustee to hold the legal title. And while he (Burr Garland) took this qualified right, which we think it is a misnomer to call property, the remaindermen took a vested remainder in all the surplus or unexpended profits.

It is admitted that its exact question has never been decided in Virginia, although several cases have arisen in this State where the trusts were held to be blended, and therefore that donee had no interest that was divisible from the other cestuis que trust, and therefore no property that could be subjected to his debts.

But in Nickell v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 886, Judge Samuels, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There is nothing in the nature or law of property which could prevent the testatrix, when about to die, from appropriating her property to the support of her poor and helpless relations; nothing to prevent her from charging her property with the expense of food, raiment and shelter for such relations. There is nothing in law or reason, I conceive, which should prevent her from appointing an agent or trustee to administer her bounty.

But the question has been carefully considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 23 L. ed. 254, and by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the case of Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170, and in each case it was held that there was nothing in the doctrines of the American chancery which prohibits a trust like the present.

The reasoning of these cases commends itself to our judgment, and fully establishes the validity of this trust.

The decree of the court below being in conflict with these views, must be reversed, and the cause must be remanded for further proceedings to be had in accordance with this opinion.

Decree reversed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

Henry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the appellee against the Pullman Palace Car Company, a corporation, to recover damages. The petition alleges that plaintiff and his wife engaged passage on a train of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to Terrell, in this State; that, being such passengers, they, at a point in the State of Louisiana, applied to the defendant corporation for, and obtained from it, berths on the Pullman sleeping-car, which was run in connection with the train on said railway; that shortly after entering said sleeping-car, plaintiff and his wife retired, and were asleep; that, under the rules and regulations of defendant, and by common usage and practice, defendant's agents in charge of said corporation were bound to awake plaintiff and his wife in time to enable them to dress and get off the train at Terrell, the place of their destination, and that they relied on them to do so; that said agents went to sleep and neglected their duty; that when said train reached the water-tank, about one-half mile east of the passenger depot at Terrell, which it did about 5 o'clock in the morning of February 5, 1889, it was stopped for the purpose of taking on a supply of water, and for other purposes, and that this fact was known or should have been known to defendant's agents; that, when said train had stopped at said water-tank, defendant's said agents awoke plaintiff and his wife, and told them that they were at the depot, and to hurry off; that said agents caused plaintiff and his wife to get off of said car at said water-tank; that in the excitement and rush incident to the announcement that the train was at Terrell, and that all must hurry off, plaintiff's wife was pushed and shoved off and down the car-steps to the ground, some three feet in distance; that his wife had no time to properly dress herself; that it was a cold and damp morning; that the ground and grass were wet from recent rains; that as soon as plaintiff and his wife were off the train, and before they had learned of the mistake, and that the depot had not been reached, the train moved off and left them standing in the rain, mud, and cold; that plaintiff and his wife were strangers in Terrell, and did not know where the depot and hotels were situated; that it was so dark as to make it impossible to move with discretion; that they were forced to remain standing at the water-tank for a great while in the rain, mud, and cold; that plaintiff's wife was greatly frightened, and was made sick by the exposure; that she was confined to her bed and unable to care for herself for more than five weeks; that plaintiff was forced to provide medical aid for her, and pay therefor; that plaintiff was forced to remain away from his home, which was in the State of Louisiana, and his business, to give his attention to his wife, for more than two weeks, and suffered much mental anguish on account of his wife's condition; that his wife suffered greatly, and that her health was permanently impaired because of the premises.

We think that the petition states a good cause of action, and that there was no error in overruling defendant's demurrer. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff on the verdict of a jury for $1,125.

The wife of plaintiff gave her deposition as a witness, detailing very fully the circumstances of her exposure and sickness, and, in reply to a question, said: "I know of nothing else that could have caused my illness except the exposure to which I was subjected on the morning when I got off the train." There was no error in overruling defendant's objection to this evidence. The plaintiff, on his examination as a witness, made the following statement: "I was getting a salary of $1,250 per annum, eight months' school, as professor in the state normal, and lost three weeks in attending my wife, which it was necessary for me to do." The defendant objected to the evidence, and now assigns error on its admission, upon the ground that it was irrelevant. One of the elements of damages stated in the plaintiff's petition was loss of his own time while attending and nursing his wife. Evidence tending to prove that issue cannot be considered irrelevant. We find no error in the action of the court in permitting the physician who attended Mrs. Smith during her illness to state what she told him while he was treating her, about her exposure at the place where she left the train, in connection with his own opinion as to the cause of her sickness. The statement was made as the basis of the doctor's opinion, and not as independent evidence to establish the fact of exposure; even had the latter been the purpose, it would furnish no ground for the reversal of the judgment, as both the wife and the husband had, as witnesses, themselves fully stated every fact upon the subject, and there was no opposing evidence with regard to the circumstances attending their leaving the train, and the exposure that followed it.

Appellant complains of the following extract from the charge of the court: "If defendant's agent was guilty of negligence to the plaintiff's damage, and plaintiff or wife were also guilty of negligence, which contributed to the injury or damage, the defendant cannot be held liable for such damage or injury, unless it has been shown that the negligence of defendant's agent was the direct and proximate cause of the damage."

Abstractly considered, this charge was erroneous. It relieved the plaintiff from the effect of the contributory negligence of himself and his wife, if such negligence had existed. The record, however, contains no evidence whatever tending to show negligence upon the part of the plaintiff or his wife at the time the wrong was committed, and therefore no charge upon contributory negligence was called for or proper. The charge as given could not prejudice defendant, under the proof. While it is true that the contract for carriage was with the Railroad Company, and not with the defendant, and that the Railroad Company was under obligations to plaintiff, as a carrier, for which it would have been liable to him for damage if it had failed in its duty, it still remains to be said that the defendant also owed certain duties to the passengers. Pullman P. Car Co. v. Pollock, 69 Tex. 120; Pullman P. Car Co. v. Matthews, 74 Tex. 654.

The evidence shows that the Pullman car was hauled by the Railroad Company, and that the porter and conductor on the sleeping-car were the servants, and under the control, of the Sleeping-Car Company. The record contains no evidence with regard to rules, regulations, or usages relating to the transportation of passengers on such cars. It does show that the defendant, and not the Railroad Company, received the compensation for and undertook to furnish the sleeping accommodations, and that they at least were under the exclusive control of the defendant. Whatever may be the duty of the Railroad Company with regard to notifying its passengers, including such as may be in the sleeping-car, of its arrival at the station to which they are destined, we are not able to conclude that the servants of the defendant owe no such duty to the sleeping passenger; on the contrary, we think that the obligation to awake and notify the passenger in time for him to prepare to safely and comfortably leave the train at the point of his destination is directly involved in the contract for the use of the sleeping-berth. In this case, the servant of the defendant assumed the discharge of that duty, and from that fact, as well as the failure of the defendant to introduce any evidence explaining what the duties of its servants were, or as to what are the usages and rules in force on its cars, it may properly be presumed that the servant of defendant was acting within the scope of his employment. There can be no doubt that the negligent discharge of the duty resulted in damage to the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

Municipal officers to whom, as such,

NOTE.—Municipal corporation may take and administer property in trust for charitable uses.

A city as a corporation is capable of taking in trust devises and bequests for charitable uses, and may carry into effect such devises and bequests. Perin v. Carey, 65 U. S. 24 How. 465, 16 L. ed. 701.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Nicholas Van Slyck for petitioners.

Mr. Cyrus M. Van Slyck for respondents.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1861, by Pub. Laws R. I., chap. 367, of March 8, 1861, the General Assembly authorized gifts by deed or will to the Commissioners of the North Burial Grounds in the City of Providence, and their successors in office, for the purpose of constituting a fund to be held in perpetual trust, and the income thereof to be applied to the care of burial lots and memorials to the dead, as set forth in the instrument creating the trust. The Commissioners were directed to make investments of the trust property, to keep accounts, apply the income, and to make detailed reports to the municipal court of the city. At the January Session, A. D. 1889, by Pub. Laws R. I., chap. 781, of April 25, 1889, the General Assembly directed the Commissioners of the North Burial Ground to pay over to the Commissioners of the sinking funds of the City of Providence the perpetual care funds held by them, with such as should thereafter come to them, and changed the duty of investing the same from the Commissioners of the Burial Ground to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, the former to continue to receive and apply the income as before. Upon demand of the petitioners for payment to them, under this Act, of the perpetual care funds, the respondents refused to make the payment, upon the claim that they hold said funds as trustees under said chapter 367; and that chapter 781, so far as it directs the payment of the funds held prior to its passage, is inoperative, because the title had vested in them as trustees.

The question now comes before us on a petition for mandamus. The argument of the respondents is that chapter 367, and the Acts of the individuals making trust gifts under it, constitute a grant or executed contract; and that the later Act, changing the custody of the fund and duty of investment, is within the meaning of the clause in the Constitution which prohibits the passage of a law impairing the obligation of a contract. They refer to Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162, and Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629, in support of their position. These two noted cases are of undoubted authority, to the effect that vested rights, under an unrestricted grant to an individual or private corporation, when a law is in the nature of a contract, cannot be devested by a subsequent change or repeal of the law, because this would impair the obligation of an executed contract. The case before us is quite different, for it does not affect an individual or private corporation. The respondents are not here in defense of private vested rights, but as officers of a public municipal corporation, claiming certain rights, under a statute, as incidental to their office. As individuals, they can lay no claim to the administration of the fund, but only as Commissioners of the North Burial Ground. If one should go out of office, his title would be at an end. Hence they stand in the same relation to the fund that the city itself would if it were the trustee, in its own name, instead of its officers and agents. In regard to the power of the Legislature to alter or repeal a grant, a marked distinction has always been observed between private and public grants. Following the cases cited above, it has become settled that an unrestricted grant to an individual or private corporation becomes, when accepted, a contract which is beyond legislative control. It has also become settled that special powers conferred upon a municipal corporation or its officers are not vested rights as against the State. But questions have arisen with reference to the right of a municipal corporation to be a trustee, and also of the right of the State to control it, when it is acting as such. The leading case of this country upon the subject was Vidal v. Girard, 48 U. S. 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205, where it was held that a municipal corporation, when authorized by law, may take and hold property in trust; and so the donation in the well-known will of Stephen Girard to the City of Philadelphia, in trust for charitable purposes, was sustained. In 1869 the management of this trust was, by Act of the Legislature, taken away from the city, and committed to a board of directors of the Police Jury v. Shreveport, 5 La. Ann. 661; Louisiana State Bank v. New Orleans Nav. Co. 3 La. Ann. 294; Reynolds v. Baldwin, 1 La. Ann. 162; Haynes v. Municipality No. 2, 5 La. Ann. 760; Egerton v. Municipality No. 3, 1 La. Ann. 436; Board of Liquidators v. Municipality No. 1, 6 La. Ann. 21.

It is within the power of the Legislature to devest a municipal corporation of the power to administer a trust and to appoint or provide for the appointment of new trustees independent of the corporation, and vest in them the management of such trusts. Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169; Montpelier v. East Montpelier, 29 Vt. 21.

Since the Legislature cannot alienate any part of its legislative power it cannot therefore by legislative Act or contract invest any municipal corporation with an irrevocable franchise of government over any part of its territory. Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169.

The doings between municipal corporations and 18 L. R. A.

the Legislature are in the nature of legislation rather than compact, and subject to all legislative conditions named, and therefore to be considered as not violated by subsequent legislative changes. East Hartford v. Hartford Bridge Co. 51 U. S. 10 How. 511, 13 L. ed. 618; New Orleans v. Hoyle, 23 La. Ann. 740; Trustees of Schools v. Tatman, 13 Ill. 30.

As to the power of a municipal corporation to administer a public charity, see notes to Cary Library v. Bliss (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 766; Cottman v. Grace (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 147.

What are public charities. See notes to Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd (Pa.) 1 L. R. A. 417; Cottman v. Grace, supra; Stratton v. Physio-Medical Institute (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 33; Bullard v. Chandler (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 105; State v. Ladies of the Sacred Heart (Mo.) 6 L. R. A. 84.

Municipalities as trustees. See note to Cottman v. Grace, supra.

city trusts. This action of the Legislature was contested, but was upheld in Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169, upon the ground that a municipal organization, trustees of a charity, cannot set up a vested right to maintain such organization in the form in which it was when the trust was created, and prevent the State from changing it as the public interests may require. These cases determine the right of a municipal corporation to act as a trustee, when duly authorized, and also the right of the Legislature to deplete the corporation of such rights, and to commit the administration of the trust to others. The same right has been recognized in other cases. Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472, 26 L. ed. 197; Girard v. Philadelphia, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 1, 19 L. ed. 58; Montpelier v. East Montpelier, 29 Vt. 12. Upon the authority of these cases, Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (§§ 80, 437), lays it down as unquestioned law that a municipal body may both act as trustee, and also be de-vested of a public trust, at the will of the Legislature.

But it may be urged that a trust for the care of one's private burial lot is not within this rule, because it is not a public charitable trust. This court has held (Kelly v. Nichols, 17 R. I. 105), that such a trust is a private, and not a charitable trust. Nevertheless the General Assembly, in 1852, specially authorized towns to receive and hold funds in trust for that purpose, which authority still continues, and, as has been stated, gave a like authority to the Commissioners of the North Burial Ground in 1861. If, when the trust is for a recognized charitable purpose, a municipal corporation, in its capacity as trustee, is subject to the will of the Legislature, a fortiori we think it is clear that it is equally subject in case of a private trust which it can only hold by authority of the Legislature; and, if the administration of the trust can be taken from the hands of the municipal corporation itself, certainly its officers and agents can hold under no stronger claim. If the respondents' position is correct, the city is bound to continue the office of Commissioners of the North Burial Grounds in order to support the trust. We think this could hardly have been contemplated by the donors of the funds, but rather in making the gifts, in the words of Judge Sherswood, in Philadelphia v. Fox, supra, "they must be held to have done so with the full knowledge that the trustee so selected was a mere creature of the State,—an agent acting under a revocable power." Our conclusion, therefore, is that the Legislature had power to change the custody of the funds from the respondents to the complainants. In reaching this conclusion we have taken the case as presented, without regard to the last section of chapter 867, which provides that the Act shall be subject to all future Acts in amendment or repeal thereof, although we see no reason why this section might not be regarded as conclusive of the question before us.

Petition granted.

Patrick DEMPSEY
v.
James CHAMBERS.

(....Mass....)

Ratification by one of acts which another has, without authority, performed, as his servant and for his benefit, will make him answerable for the latter's negligent acts which were so connected with the employment that he would have been liable for them as master if the latter had been his servant when committing them.

(September 8, 1891.)

NOTE.—General rules applied to ratification.

The ratification must be entire, or not at all; the principal is not permitted to ratify in part, and to reject in part. Southern Exp. Co. v. Palmer, 48 Ga. 85; Cochran v. Chitwood, 59 Ill. 53; Widnerjv. Lane, 14 Mich. 124; Krider v. Western College, 31 Iowa, 547; Billings v. Morrow, 7 Cal. 171; Hardeman v. Ford, 12 Ga. 206; Menkens v. Watson, 27 Mo. 163; Henderson v. Cummings, 44 Ill. 325; Coleman v. Stark, 1 Or. 115.

1. A ratification of a part of an authorized transaction of an agent, or of one who assumes to act as such, is a confirmation of the whole. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Walworth, 1 N. Y. 433; Fowler v. Trull, 1 Hun, 409, 3 Thomp. & C. 522; Krider v. Western College, 31 Iowa, 547; Menkens v. Watson, 27 Mo. 163; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 233.

Ratification of the unauthorized act of another operates upon the act ratified as if authority to do the act had been previously given, except where the rights of third parties have intervened. It is essential that the party ratifying should be able not merely to do the act ratified at the time the act was done, but also at the time the ratification was made. Cook v. Tullis, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 333, 21 L. ed. 933, Field, J.; Marsh v. Fulton County, 77 U. S. 10 13 L. R. A.

Wall. 684, 19 L. ed. 1043; Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 451, 30 L. ed. 189.

It is not allowed by law, when the act ratified is itself forbidden at the time of ratification. McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591; Bird v. Brown, 4 Exch. 799; Lord Audley's Case, Cro. Eliz. 560, Moore, 457; Margaret Podger's Case, 9 Coke, 104a; Cook v. Tullis, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 333, 21 L. ed. 933.

If a principal ratifies that part of a transaction which favors him, he ratifies the whole. Gaines v. Miller, 111 U. S. 8, 335, 23 L. ed. 486.

It is a rule in the law of agency, that when the unauthorized act of the agent is done in the execution of a power conferred in a mode not sanctioned by its terms and in excess or misuse of the authority given, ratification by the principal is more readily implied from slight acts of confirmation. Harrod v. McDaniels, 126 Mass. 415.

It is an adoption of an unauthorized transaction by the party beneficially interested. Schwartz v. Weber, 6 N. Y. S. R. 693.

It is said that a distinction exists between the classes of cases to which this principle applies. Where the original act was one merely voidable in its nature, the principal may ratify the act of his agent, although it was unauthorized. But where

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Essex County (Thompson, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover the value of a plate-glass window alleged to have been broken by the negligence of defendant's servant, which resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff. Exceptions overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Knox, for defendant:

Even if the acts of McCulloch in receiving the order for the coal and undertaking to fill it were fully ratified by the defendant with knowledge of his negligence, the defendant would not be liable for the negligence under the fact found that McCulloch was not the servant or agent of the defendant at the time his negligent act caused the injury.

Coomes v. Houghton, 102 Mass. 211.

Messrs. J. P. Sweeney and H. R. Dow, for plaintiff:

A subsequent ratification is equivalent to a prior authority, and renders the principal liable for all the acts of the agent, tortious or otherwise, done in the regular course of business, as fully as if he had originally given him direct authority in the premises.

Story, Ag. 9th ed. § 239; Clement v. Jones, 12 Mass. 60.

When a party assumes to act for another without any authority whatever, if that other subsequently ratifies his act he makes him his agent.

Y. B. 7 Hen. IV. p. 35; Hagedorn v. Oliver-son, 2 Maule & S. 485; Rogers v. Kneeland, 10 Wend. 218; Kelley v. Munson, 7 Mass. 319.

If the principal accepts the proceeds or benefits of the unauthorized act of the person assuming to act for him he is precluded from denying the latter's authority.

Woodbury v. Larned, 5 Minn. 389; Gibson v. Norway Sav. Bank, 60 Me. 579; Veazie v. Williams, 49 U. S. 8 How. 184, 12 L. ed. 1018.

The demand made upon the plaintiff for the proceeds and profits of the unauthorized acts of McCulloch, on the ground that the plaintiff "owed" the defendant for the coal, is a ratification; for a claim of debt would not, on any other ground, be maintainable.

Story, Ag. 9th ed. § 259, note 1, and cases cited.

A ratification can only be effectual between the parties when the act is done by the agent avowedly for or on account of the principal, and not when it is done for or on account of the agent himself, or some third person.

Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219, 225; Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B. N. S. 755; Wilson v. Tumman, 6 Man. & G. 236; Farmers L. & T. Co. v. Walworth, 1 N. Y. 433, 444; Commercial & C. Bank v. Jones, 18 Tex. 811.

And this is the distinction which must be made between the case at bar and the case of Coomes v. Houghton, 102 Mass. 211.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort to recover damages for the breaking of a plate-glass window. The glass was broken by the negligence of one McCulloch, while delivering some coal which had been ordered of the defendant by the plaintiff. It is found as a fact that McCulloch was not the defendant's servant when he broke the window, but that the "delivery of the coal by [him] was ratified by the defendant, and that such ratification made McCulloch in law the agent and servant of the defendant in the delivery of the coal." On this finding the court ruled "that the defendant by his ratification of the delivery of the coal by McCulloch became responsible for his negligence in the delivery of the coal." The defendant excepted to this ruling and to nothing else. We must assume that the finding was warranted by the evidence, a majority of the court being of the opinion that the bill of exceptions does not purport to set forth all the evidence on which the finding was made. Therefore the only question before us is as to the correctness of the ruling just stated.

If we were contriving a new code to-day we might hesitate to say that a man could make himself a party to a bare tort in any case merely by assenting to it after it had been committed. But we are not at liberty to refuse to carry out to its consequences any that act was void, as in case of a forgery, it is said no ratification can be made, independent of the principle of estoppel. Workman v. Wright, 38 Ohio St. 405, 31 Am. Rep. 548.

The meaning of ratification is, and always has been, the adoption of an act purporting to be done, or, at least, done in fact, on behalf of the ratifier. Y. B. 30 Edw. I. 128; 7 Hen. IV. 34, 35, pl. 1; Anonymous, Godbolt, 109, pl. 129; Wilson v. Tumman, 6 Man. & G. 236.

The mere silence of the owner, after his property has been taken by a trespasser, will not in law amount to a ratification and adoption of the unlawful act. Thompson v. Craig, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 32; Story, Ag. § 251; 2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. 616, note 1; Wilson v. Tumman, supra; Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B. N. S. 756.

As a general rule, the principal has the right to elect whether he will adopt the unauthorized act or not. But having once ratified the act, upon a full knowledge of all the material circumstances, the ratification cannot be revoked or recalled, and the principal becomes bound as if he had originally authorized the act. Story, Ag. § 250; Paley, Ag. 13 L. R. A.

Lloyd's ed. 171; 3 Chitty, Com. Law, 197; Bouvier, Law Dict. title Ratification.

The general doctrine that one may, by affirmative acts, and even by silence, ratify the acts of another who has assumed to act as his agent, is illustrated by many cases to be found in the books, and set forth by all the text-writers upon the law of agency. Story, Ag. § 251a; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 66, 67; 2 Kent, Com. 616; Thompson v. Craig, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 32; Wilson v. Tumman, supra; Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B. N. S. 756.

But the doctrine properly applies only to cases where one has assumed to act as agent for another, and then a subsequent ratification is equivalent to an original authority. One may wrongly take the property of another not assuming to act as agent, and sell it in his own name and on his own account, and in such case there is no question of agency, and there is nothing to ratify. The owner may subsequently confirm the sale, but this he cannot do by a simple ratification. His confirmation must rest upon some consideration upholding the confirmation, or upon an estoppel. Workman v. Wright, 38 Ohio St. 405.

principle which we believe to have been part of the common law simply because the grounds of policy on which it must be justified seem to us to be hard to find and probably to have belonged to a different state of society.

It is hard to explain why a master is liable to the extent that he is for the negligent acts of one who at the time really is his servant acting within the general scope of his employment. Probably master and servant are "feigned to be all one person" by a fiction which is an echo of the patria potestas and of the English frank pledge. Byington v. Simpson, 184 Mass. 169, 170; Fitzh. Abr. Corone, pl. 428. Possibly the doctrine of ratification is another aspect of the same tradition. The requirement that the act should be done in the name of the ratifying party looks that way. New England Dredging Co. v. Rockport Granite Co. 149 Mass. 881, 882; Fuller & Trimmell's Case, 2 Leon. 215, 216; Sext. Dec. 5, 12; De Reg. Jur. Reg. 9; Dig. 43, 26, 13; Dig. 43, 16, 1, § 14, gloss. and cases next cited.

The earliest instances of liability by way of ratification in the English law so far as we have noticed were where a man retained property acquired through the wrongful act of another. Y. B. 30 Edw. I. 128 (Rolle, ed.); 38 Lib. Ass. 223, pl. 9; S. C. 38 Edw. III. 18, 12th ed. IV. 9, pl. 23; Plowd. 8 ad fin. 27, 31; See Bracton, 158 b, 159 a, 171 b.

But in these cases the defendant's assent was treated as relating back to the original act, and at an early date the doctrine of relation was carried so far as to hold that where a trespass would have been justified if it had been done by the authority by which it purported to have been done, a subsequent ratification might also justify it. Y. B. 7 Hen. IV. 34, pl. 1. This decision is qualified in Fitzh. Abr. Baylye, pl. 4, and doubted in Bro. Abr. Trespass, pl. 86; but it has been followed or approved so continuously and in so many later cases that it would be hard to deny that the common law was as there stated by Chief Justice Gascoigne. Anonymous, Godbolt, 109, 110, pl. 129, 2 Leon. 196, pl. 246; Hull v. Pickersgill, 1 Brod. & B. 282; Muskett v. Drummond, 10 Barn. & C. 153, 157; Buron v. Denman, 2 Exch. 167, 178; Secretary of State in Council of India v. Kamachee Boye Sahaba, 18 Moore, P. C. 22, 86; Cheetham v. Manchester, L. R. 10 C. P. 249; Wiggins v. United States, 3 Ct. Cl. 412.

If we assume that an alleged principal by adopting an act which was unlawful when done can make it lawful, it follows that he adopts it at his peril and is liable if it should turn out that his previous command would not have justified the act. It never has been doubted that a man's subsequent agreement to a trespass done in his name and for his benefit amounts to a command so far as to make him answerable. The ratihabito mandato comparatur of the Roman lawyers and the earlier cases (Dig. 46, 3, 12, § 4; 43, 16, 1, § 14; Y. B. 30 Edw. I. 128), has been changed to the dogma equiparatur ever since the days of Lord Coke, 4 Inst. 317; See Bro. Abr. Trespass, pl. 113; Co. Litt. 207 a; Wingate Max. 124; Com. Dig. Trespass, 18 L. R. A.

chap. 1; Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. 814, 326, 327, and cases hereafter cited.

Doubts have been expressed, which we need not consider, whether this doctrine applied to the case of a bare personal tort. Adams v. Freeman, 9 Johns. 117, 118; Anderson and Warberton, JJ., in Bishop v. Montague, Cro. Eliz. 824.

If a man assaulted another in the street out of his own head, it would seem rather strong to say that if he merely called himself my servant and I afterwards assented, without more, our mere words would make me a party to the assault, although in such cases the canon law excommunicated the principal if the assault was upon a clerk. Sext. Dec. 5, 11, 23. Perhaps the application of the doctrine would be avoided on the ground that the facts did not show an act done for the defendant's benefit (Wilson v. Barker, 1 Nev. & Man. 409, 4 Barn. & Ad. 614; Smith v. Lazo, 42 Mich. 6), as in other cases it has been on the ground that they did not amount to such a ratification as was necessary. Tucker v. Jerrie, 75 Me. 184; Hyde v. Cooper, 26 Vt. 552.

But the language generally used by judges and text-writers and such decisions as we have been able to find is broad enough to cover a case like the present when the ratification is established. Perley v. Georgetown, 7 Gray, 464; Bishop v. Montague, supra; Sanderson v. Baker, 2 W. Bl. 832; 3 Wils. 309; Barker v. Braham, 2 Bl. 866, 868; 3 Wils. 368; Badkin v. Pocell, Cowp. 476, 479; Wilson v. Tunnan, 6 Man. & G. 236, 242; Lewis v. Read, 13 Mees. & W. 834; Buron v. Denman, 2 Exch. 167, 188; Bird v. Brown, 4 Exch. 786, 799; Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. 814, 326, 327; Roe v. Birkenhead, L. & C. J. R. Co. 7 Exch. 36, 44; Ancona v. Marks, 7 Hurlst. & N. 686, 695; Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219, 225; Exum v. Brister, 35 Miss. 391; Galveston, II. & S. A. R. Co. v. Donahoe, 56 Tex. 162; Murray v. Lorejoy, 2 Cliff. 191, 195. See Lovejoy v. Murray, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 1, 9, 18 L. ed. 129-131; Story, Ag. §§ 455, 456.

The question remains whether the ratification is established. As we understand the bill of exceptions McCullock took on himself to deliver the defendant's coal for his benefit and as his servant, and the defendant afterwards assented to McCullock's assumption. The ratification was not directed specifically to McCullock's trespass, and that act was not for the defendant's benefit if taken by itself, but it was so connected with McCullock's employment that the defendant would have been liable as master if McCullock really had been his servant when delivering the coal. We have found hardly anything in the books dealing with the precise case, but we are of opinion that consistency with the whole course of authority requires us to hold that the defendant's ratification of the employment established the relation of master and servant from the beginning with all its incidents including the anomalous liability for his negligent acts. See Coomes v. Houghton, 102 Mass. 211, 213, 214; Cooley, Torts, 128, 129. The ratification goes to the relation and establishes it ab initio. The relation existing, the master is answerable for torts which he has not ratified specifically, just as he is for those which he has not commanded and as he may be for those which he has expressly forbidden. In Gibson's Case, Lane, 90, it was agreed that if strangers as servants to Gibson but without his precedent appointment had seized goods by color of his office, and afterwards had misused the goods and Gibson ratified the seizure, he thereby became a trespasser ab initio, although not privy to the misusing which made him so. And this proposition is stated as law in Com. Dig. Trespass, chap. 1; Elder v. Bemis, 2 Met. 599, 605.

In Coomes v. Houghton, 102 Mass. 211, the alleged servant did not profess to act as servant to the defendant and the decision was that a subsequent payment for his work by the defendant would not make him one.

For these reasons in the opinion of a majority of the court the exceptions must be overruled.

Exceptions overruled.

HENDERSON

v.

Charles M. HOVEY, State Auditor.

HUBBELL

v.

Solomon G. STOVER, State Treasurer.

(....Kan.....)

*1. No money can be drawn from the treasury of the State, except in pursuance of a specific appropriation made by law.

2. Where the Legislature has made a specific appropriation of $2,000 for the compensation of the secretary, stenographer, and other officers of the State Senate during the sitting of the Senate for an impeachment trial, neither the auditor nor Treasurer of State has the authority to allow or pay any compensation for such officers in excess of said specific amount so appropriated.

(July 2, 1891.)

APPLICATIONS for writs of mandamus to compel the State Auditor and Treasurer to audit and pay certain claims for services rendered by employés of the Senate during an impeachment trial. Refused.

*Head notes by HORTON, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Preliminaries necessary to the withdrawal of public funds.

Authority, for paying out the public money should be found in some law. One claiming to draw money out of the treasury of the county or the State should be able to point to a law that clearly authorizes the expenditure. Kennedy v. Seamans, 60 Ga. 612; Maxwell v. Cumming, 58 Ga. 384; Houston County v. Kersh, 82 Ga. 255.

Under La. Const., art. 53, the general appropriation bill may embrace several items or objects of expenditures of public moneys, but all other appropriations shall be made by separate bills each embracing but one object. Keln v. State Treasurer, 42 La. Ann. 174.

When the Legislature has clearly indicated its will as to a claim which is to be paid out of the general fund in the state treasury, the constitutional requirement as to appropriation by the legislative department is satisfied, and no particular form of words is essential to make the appropriation valid. Humbert v. Dunn, 84 Cal. 57.

Cal. Stat. 1889, 421, providing that each member of the examining commission of rivers and harbors shall receive a salary of $2,400 per annum, payable 13 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Chester I. Long for applicants.

Mr. J. N. Ives, Atty-Gen., for defendants.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These proceedings have been commenced in this court by mandamus to enable certain persons, who were employés of the Senate, acting as a court of impeachment, to recover their compensation for their services. The State Treasurer, in one case, has refused to register and countersign the warrant issued by the Auditor and has refused to recognize it. In the other case, the Auditor of State has refused to audit the claim of the employé, and has also refused to issue any warrant for his services. The court has examined the various provisions of the Statute which have been referred to. The claim is first made that under section 8, chap. 25, Sess. Laws 1891, the Senate had authority to transfer, from the appropriation made to it of $8,000 for the per diem and mileage of its members, any balance not necessary for the pay of its members. They passed a resolution transferring a portion of the $8,000 for the secretary, stenographer, and other officers of the Senate. The conclusion of the monthly, and his traveling expenses while engaged in the performance of official duties, to be paid out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, constitutes an appropriation without further action of the Legislature, within Cal. Const., art. 4, § 22, providing that no money shall be drawn from the state treasury except in consequence of appropriations made by law. Ibid.

An appropriation is "made by law" when it plainly declares what the amount of compensation shall be; and no legislative appropriation is necessary in such a case to authorize payment from the public treasury. State v. Hickman, 8 L. R. A. 408, 9 Mont. 370.

Under Mo. Const., prescribing the conditions and proceedings incident to the payment of money out of the state treasury, a reappropriation of an unused balance of a former appropriation is upon the same footing as the original appropriation, as to the necessity of stating the object for which such reappropriation is made. State v. Seibert, 90 Mo. 122.

In Nebraska, the appropriation made by the Legislature, where there is no provision limiting particular cases to a shorter period, extends to the end of the first fiscal quarter after the adjournment court is, after giving the matter as much attention as it has been able to do in the time allowed, that section 8 of chapter 25 is a specific appropriation for the various amounts for the purposes therein named. For instance, there is no general appropriation for any amount to pay the whole expense of the trial. There are specific appropriations only. First, for the per diem and mileage of members of the Senate, and the president thereof, while sitting as a court of impeachment, $8,000 is given. There is a specific appropriation for the compensation of the secretary, stenographer, and other officers of the Senate of $2,000 only. Had the Legislature, as it had the power to do, simply provided that $27,500 or any other general sum, was appropriated to pay the expenses of the trial, such an amount could be drawn out for that purpose. Section 3 of said chapter 25 reads as follows: "To pay the expenses incidental to the trial of Judge Theodosius Botkin, who has been impeached by the House of Representatives of high misdemeanors in office, there is hereby appropriated the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to wit: For per diem and mileage of the members of the Senate and president thereof while sitting as a court of impeachment, $8,000; per diem and mileage of the board of managers of the House of Representatives and counsel and stenographer, to be appointed by said board, $1,500; compensation of secretary, stenographer, and other officers of the Senate, $2,000; for service of process, $1,000; per diem and mileage of witnesses, $15,000." Now, if the State Senate had the right to transfer from the $8,000 any balance thereof for the compensation of its officers or employés, it had the same right, under said section 3, to transfer it for the purpose of paying counsel or anyone else employed in the trial. The Constitution of the State ordains that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury except in pursuance of a specific appropriation made by law." Section 24, art. 2. Upon an examination of section 3, we find that specific appropriations were made for several distinct and separate purposes, and this court has no authority to make any change in that section; and, the Legislature having specified the particular amounts for the several purposes, they can be used for those purposes, but those only.

It is next argued that if section 3 of chapter 25 cannot furnish money for these employés, they ought to be paid from the general appropriation for the expenses of the Legislature, under section 1 of said chapter 25. The cardinal rule of construction is that the intention of the Legislature must control, and, where there is appropriated a certain sum of money for the pay of members of the Legislature, and its officers and clerks, the ordinary conclusion would be that they are to apply to both Houses of the Legislature and its officers, while in session as a Legislature, and not while one body thereof is acting as a court of impeachment. Section 2 of said chapter 25 provides "that the pay warrants for the members of the Legislature for the last ten days of service shall not be drawn by the Auditor of State until three days after the expiration of the fifty days of regular session, or upon the final adjournment of the Legislature previous to the date herein fixed." We think that the proper construction of said section 3 is that the Legislature intended to make a specific appropriation for the expenses of the impeachment trial of Judge Botkin, and did not intend that any other moneys should be used for that trial than those appropriated in said section 3. In carrying out the intent of the Legislature, we must hold that there is no money appropriated to pay any compensation for the officers or employés of the Senate during the trial of Judge Botkin, excepting the specific sum of $2,000. It may be possible that the Legislature intended that $2,000 should be the limit of the expenses for those purposes, and, having appropriated $2,000 only, this court cannot now say that the employés should be paid out of some other appropriation, or that more should have been appropriated. The of the next regular session. State v. Babcock, 22 Neb. 88.

Public moneys.

No moneys can be paid from the treasury, except in pursuance of an appropriation by law, nor unless within two years after such appropriation; and every law making or continuing, etc., an appropriation, must distinctly specify the sum and the object. Const. 1846, art. 7, § 8.

A two-thirds vote of each branch of the Legislature is required to render valid appropriation bills. Const. 1822, art. 7, § 9; Const. 1846, art. 1, § 9; 1 Abb. N. Y. Dig. 227.

While it is customary to use the words, "there is hereby appropriated the sum," etc., in bills appropriating money for the payment of salary and other expenses of the government, it is not essential to the validity of an appropriation that those words, or any of them, should be used if the Legislature has clearly designated the amount and the fund out of which it is to be paid. Humbert v. Dunn, 84 Cal. 87.

The limitation that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law" is taken literally from the Constitution of the United States. Its object is to secure to the legislative department of the government the exclusive power of deciding how, when, and for what purposes the public funds shall be applied in carrying on the government. 2 Ops. Atty-Gen. 670.

To the legislative department of the government is intrusted the power to say to what purpose the public funds shall be devoted in each fiscal year, and, as stated before, when the Legislature has clearly indicated its will as to the claim which is to be paid, and the fund from which it is to be paid, the constitutional requirement is satisfied, and no particular form of words is essential to make the appropriation valid. Proll v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 220.

An appropriation of the money to a specified object would be an authority to the proper officers to pay the money, because the auditor is authorized to draw his warrant upon an appropriation, and the treasurer is authorized to pay such warrant, if he has appropriated money in the treasury. And such an appropriation may be prospective; that is, it may be made in one year, of the revenues to accrue in another or future years,—the law being so framed as to address itself to such future revenues. Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 328. See note to Henderson v. Soldiers & S. Mon. Comrs. (Ind.) 13 L. R. A. 169.

State Treasurer and the Auditor must act in accordance with the specific appropriation named in said section 8.

It is further urged that the auditor should be required to issue his warrant whether there is any balance of the specific appropriation remaining in the treasury or not. An examination of the provisions of the Statute in regard to the duty of the auditor clearly shows that the auditor must take notice of what money has been appropriated for any specific purpose, and when that amount has been fully exhausted by claims presented and audited, he has no authority to allow or audit other claims, and issue warrants therefor. See paragraphs 6582, 6597, 6676, Gen. Stat. 1889. The warrant issued by the Auditor was not, in our opinion, issued in conformity with the provisions of said chapter 25. The Treasurer properly refused to recognize it. The Auditor has no right, in the absence of a sufficient appropriation, to issue warrants generally, to be provided for by some future Legislature. Considering all the terms of chapter 25, we cannot find our way clear to allow this writ. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," and it is very unfortunate that provision was not fully made by the late Legislature for the payment of all the expenses of the impeachment trial. They provided that $2,000 should be appropriated for the officers or employes of the senate during the trial, and, until further action is taken by the Legislature, no more than $2,000 can be used to pay these parties. We cannot order the payment of the amounts prayed for, as this court cannot change the Statute.

The writs of mandamus in both cases will be denied. We regret this result, but we do not make the laws; we only interpret them. All the Justices concur.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

John A. MORSE et al.

v.

Warner MOORE.

(....Me.....)

1. A contract to deliver ice of a certain described quality and thickness is an express warranty that the ice when delivered shall be of such quality and thickness.
2. Acceptance of merchandise under an executory contract of sale warranting it to be of a certain quality does not necessarily terminate the obligation of the vendor; but it is evidence of complete performance or of waiver, the conclusiveness of which is to be determined from all the circumstances of the case.
3. The vendee in a contract to sell and deliver at a certain place for shipment ice of a specified quality and thickness, who does not see the ice until it reaches its destination, and who then immediately notifies the vendor that it is not according to contract, may set up its inferiority in defense of an action for its price, although he receives, stores and attempts to dispose of it.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Sagadahoc County made during the trial of an action brought to recover the contract price of certain ice alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiffs. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. C. E. Littlefield and A. S. Littlefield for defendant.

Mr. A. N. Williams, for plaintiffs:

Where the articles bargained for under an executory contract are to be delivered at a place certain named therein, the place of delivery is the place where the purchaser must exercise his right of rejection or acceptance of the articles tendered.

Defendant having received the ice on board his vessels at Water Cove without complaint, and carried it away, could not exercise the right of rejection at Richmond, Va., or at any other place.

Brownlee v. Bolton, 44 Mich. 218; 2 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. p. 916; Pease v. Copp, 67 Barb. 182. See also Benjamin, Sales, chapter on Acceptance; Lincoln v. Gallagher, 4 New Eng. Rep. 141, 79 Me. 189.

Defendant could not receive the ice and accept it, and then defend on the ground that it was not of the quality required under the contract.

Norton v. Dreyfuss, 7 Cent. Rep. 785, 106 N. Y. 90; Brown v. Foster, 11 Cent. Rep. 291, 108 N. Y. 887; Parks v. O'Connor, 70 Tex. 377; Coplay Iron Co. v. Pope, 10 Cent. Rep. 711, 108 N. Y. 232; Smith v. New Albany Rail Mill Co. 50 Ark. 31; Sprague v. Blake, 20 Wend. 61.

When the contract is in writing, an additional warranty, not expressed or implied by its terms, that the article is fit for a particular use, cannot be added either by implication of law or by parol proof.

Peters, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controversy in this case grows out of an agreement between plaintiffs and defendant, made and delivered in this State, which runs as follows: "This agreement, made and entered into this seventh day of January, 1888, by and between Morse & Sawyer, of Bath, Maine, of the first part, and Warner Moore, of Richmond, Va., of the second part, witnesseth:

NOTE.—Effect of acceptance of goods under contract of sale. See note to Jones v. McEwan (Ky.) 12 L. R. A. 599.

"That the said parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to them in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby sell and agree to deliver at their wharves at Water Cove (Cape Small Point, opposite Burnt Coat Island, as seen in Coast Chart No. 6, from four to six miles west of Seguin Island and light-house), Maine, after the ice has become twelve inches in thickness, of good quality, during the months of January or February, 1888, two thousand tons of good, clear, merchantable ice, not less than twelve inches in thickness, to be weighed by a sworn weigher, with all the proper fitting material necessary for the voyage included, at the price or rate of forty cents per ton of two thousand pounds. Each cargo to be paid for on presentation of sight draft or note for thirty days or sixty days, as may suit party of second part, for the amount accompanying bill of lading and weighers' certificate of said cargo. Cakes to be twenty-two by thirty inches."

The ice delivered under this contract was shipped to Richmond, Va., where the defendant resides, to be sold in that market to his customers. It was to be paid for according to its weight and quality at the port of shipment in Maine, any deterioration of the article during transit being at the risk of the purchaser.

The first question submitted to the jury was whether the ice had been accepted by the defendant or not, and that was decided in favor of the plaintiffs.

That brought up the question whether, having accepted the ice, the defendant could rely on a breach of the warranty of the quality of the ice to reduce the claim of the plaintiff, who sues in this action of indebitatus assumpsit for the contract price; the defendant alleging that the ice was not, at the time and place of delivery in Maine, of the quality called for by the contract.

The judge presiding, being of the impression that such a defense might be admissible in case of an executed agreement containing warranty, but not where the agreement is executory, ruled out the defense as a matter of law. It is to be noticed that the ruling was without qualification, admitting of no inquiry into the circumstances in which the ice was accepted. It determines that an acceptance in a case of this kind (in the absence of fraud, of course) absolutely terminates the obligation of the vendor. The judge further ruled that "when the defendant took [that is, by a hired carrier] the property and carried it away the property passed to him."

Our examination of this question leads us to the conclusion that the position of the defendant was well taken, and that the alleged defense should have been permitted to him.

That there is a warranty or a condition precedent amounting to warranty in the contract, there can be no doubt. Such a warranty will be found to be variously characterized in the books as executory warranty, a condition precedent amounting to warranty, in the nature of warranty, with the effect of warranty, equal to warranty, and the like. It is immaterial, for present purposes, whether it be regarded as an express warranty or an express condition implying warranty, as the effect must be the same. One kind within its limit is not a more potential ingredient in a contract than the other, the difference between them being only in the style of agreement to which they may be annexed. An express warranty may be also special, however. It is now well settled by the authorities generally—our own cases included—that a sale of goods by a particular description of quality imports a warranty that the goods are or shall be of that description; a warranty which becomes a part of the contract if relied upon at the time by the purchaser. Bryant v. Crosby, 40 Me. 9; Randall v. Thornton, 43 Me. 226; Hillman v. Wilcox, 30 Me. 170; Gould v. Stein, 149 Mass. 570, 5 L. R. A. 213, and cases cited. Here there is a clear description of both the kind and quality of the ice,—the quality to be merchantable.

It was conceded at the trial that the position relied on by the defense would be legitimate were it an executed, instead of executory, contract that contained the warranty. Why should there be the difference? Certain early New York cases, which will be further considered hereafter, by which the rule given at the trial is more or less supported, give as a reason for the rule that in an executory contract any article of a particular quality may be tendered in the performance of the contract, and the vendee must see if the article agrees with the terms of the contract, while in an executed sale the agreement is that a particular article actually delivered possesses the quality stipulated for. This undoubtedly expresses correctly the distinction between the classes of contract, but it does not impress us that there should be such an essential difference in their effect. The reason is not palpable why the vendee in the one case more than in the other should have to see that he receives only merchantable articles when a delivery is made. It seems inconsistent that the warranty, which is a part of either contract, should terminate at delivery in one contract, and not in the other. Each vendor makes virtually the same warranty, and the two vendors at the point of delivery would appear to stand upon common ground. The seller in an executory contract agrees to do what the seller in an executed contract has already done. When he tenders the articles that he has agreed to deliver, such articles become particularized and identified; and he then represents that such particular and identified articles possess the quality stipulated for by his executory agreement. The terms of the contract of sale become the terms of the sale. The condition precedent becomes a warranty. Prof. Wharton (Whart. Cont. § 564) expresses the idea in these words: "A substantial, though partial (defective), performance of a condition precedent, followed by acceptance on the other side, transmutes the condition precedent into a representation (implying warranty), not barring a suit on the contract, though leaving ground for a cross-action for damages."

Executory and executed contracts are very much alike in the elements that enter into them. There are executory steps in all executed contracts. A bargain precedes the sale. If there be a warranty, that is usually first a part of the bargain, and afterwards of the sale. So in an executory contract the warranty is part of the agreement of sale, and at delivery a part of the sale. Many contracts commonly spoken of as executed contracts are really wholly or partially executory. All orders for goods, whether for present or future delivery, are of an executory nature. All sales by sample are such. The author of Smith's Leading Cases (8th ed. vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 339) says in discussing this distinction: "Where the vendor agrees to sell goods of a certain kind, without designating or referring to any specific chattel, the contract is essentially executory, whether it purports to be a present transfer or a mere undertaking to deliver at a future period, and the right of property does not pass until the merchandise is delivered to or set apart for the purchaser." Every contract is executory on the one side or the other until the party has done what he has agreed to do.

The fact of acceptance, however, as a matter of evidence, may have great weight on the question of satisfactory or sufficient performance. In the first place, it raises considerable presumption that the article delivered actually corresponded with the agreement. In the next place, it is some evidence of a waiver of any defect of quality, even if the article did not so correspond; evidence of more or less force according to the circumstances of the case. If the goods be accepted without objection at the time or within a reasonable time afterwards, the evidence of waiver, unless explained, might be considered conclusive. But if, on the other hand, objection is made at the time, and the vendor notified of the defects, and the defects are material, the inference of waiver would be altogether repelled. But acceptance accompanied by silence is not necessarily a waiver. The law permits explanation, and seeks to know the circumstances which induced acceptance. It might be that the buyer was not competent to act upon his own judgment, or had no opportunity to do so, or declined to do so as a matter of expediency, placing his dependence mainly, as he has a right to do, upon the warranty of the seller. Upon this question the facts are generally for the jury, under the direction of the court.

The law of waiver more commonly applies to things that are not essential to a substantial execution of the contract; often such as relate to the time, place, or manner of performance, or that affect merely the taste or fancy, perhaps, and are such departures from literal performance as do not bring loss or injury upon the purchaser. Baldwin v. Farnsworth, 10 Me. 414; Lamb v. Barnard, 16 Me. 364.

We think the rule invoked by the defendant a just one. Speaking generally, it is the safer rule for both buyer and seller. The opposite rule imposes on either of them very great responsibility and risk. It might be ruinous to a vendee, who is in urgent need of an article, not to accept it, although even much inferior in quality to the description contained in the contract. Certainly it should not be considered a hardship to a seller to require of him a compliance with his contract, or damages for his non-compliance.

The present case illustrates the justness of the rule, if the facts are proved as the defendant alleges them. The plaintiffs agreed to deliver ice, which they warranted should be good, clear, and merchantable. Two cargoes were loaded for shipment to a southern port. Defendant furnished the vessels, though they were probably chartered by the plaintiffs on the defendant's account. There is nothing in the charge of the judge, in the exceptions, or on briefs of counsel, intimating that the defendant ever saw the ice, either by agent or personally, until it arrived in Virginia, or that he was notified to be present, or knew of the delivery at the time of it. It would seem to be a rather stringent construction of the contract that the defendant must watch the loading of the cargoes, upon the penalty, if he failed to do so, of having to pay full price for whatever defective ice might be delivered behind his back, after he had taken for his protection, and paying for it in the consideration of the contract, an agreement of warranty in such positive terms. Still it may be that the plaintiffs could legally refuse to deliver the ice unless the defendant after notice should be present to receive it. The cargoes, after reasonable passages, arrived in a very unmerchantable condition. There was no lack of objection or protest from the defendant. He wrote repeatedly, and telegraphed the plaintiffs, expressing his disappointment, and asking their advice as to the disposition of the ice. But no satisfactory answer came. What should he do? There was no possibility of reshipment, nor could the ice be preserved in that climate without the protection that his own ice-houses would afford for such purpose. Storage in any ordinary manner could not possibly save the property. He stored the ice, and sold it by enterprising expedients as rapidly as possible. He alleges that it was late spring ice, of poor texture, and in proximately worthless condition when shipped from Maine. If that can be shown by witnesses and in court at the home of the plaintiffs, it would seem to be an injustice if the defendant is not permitted to make the defense.

Mr. Benjamin (Benjamin, Sales, 8d Am. ed. p. 888), in allusion to the buyer's remedies after receiving possession of the goods, says he has three remedies against the seller for breach of the warranty of quality: first, the right to reject the goods if the property in them has not passed to him; second, a cross-action for damages for the breach; third, the right to plead the breach in defense to an action by the vendor, so as to diminish the price. These remedies are mentioned without any distinction between kinds of sales. The propositions are general, without any intimation that the procedure does not apply to warranties in executory sales. In the text such a distinction is not even noticed. In the notes to the text, however, it is remarked by the American editor that there are New York decisions inconsistent with the rule stated in the text. The first of these remedies—that of rejecting the goods—seems especially applicable to executory and inapplicable to executed sales, because it precedes acceptance, while in executed sales there has been acceptance, and the title has passed. It is only in executory contracts and contracts that are merely prima facie executed that the title has not passed.

Mr. Benjamin states further that the buyer's remedies are not dependent on his return of the goods, nor is he bound to give notice to the vendor; "but," he adds, "a failure to return the goods or complain of the quality raises a strong presumption that the complaint of defective quality is not well founded." Prof. Parsons, in the text and notes of his work on Contracts, lays down the same legal propositions that Mr. Benjamin does, making not a word of allusion to there being any difference in the application of them between sales executed and sales executory. He also states that if the buyer accepts goods inferior to such as are stipulated for, his continued possession without complaint will be a presumption against him on the question of damages. Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. *591, and notes.

Mr. Smith, in Leading Cases, in notes to the case of Chandelor v. Lopus (8th ed. vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 294), discusses and fully indorses the same rules, as deducible from the authorities, and he and the editors in the last American edition of that work cite and compare a great many of the decided cases on the subject, and they give no recognition to a distinction between executed and executory contracts in the application of such remedies. We quote a few passages from their comments: "When specific property is referred to, still, if the reference be through the medium of a sample, the contract will be so far executory as to fail of effect unless the bulk of the commodity corresponds with the sample." "Nor will his [buyer's] right to indemnity or compensation necessarily end on his acceptance and use of the goods with full knowledge of the defect, but he will be entitled to bring suit on the contract, and receive damages for the breach of the implied engagement that the bulk of the commodity should correspond with the sample exhibited at the time of the sale."

In the case at bar there was an ideal or descriptive sample,—a description equivalent to the exhibition of a sample. There can be no doubt that, if the vendee may bring an action of his own on the contract, he can as well defend against an action brought upon the contract by the vendor. "The right of the vendee to rely on the breach of warranty, or a failure to comply with the terms of an executory contract, as a defense to an action for the purchase money may now be regarded as established in England and in most of the courts in this country." "The course of decision at the present day tends towards the position that a partial failure of consideration may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages, even when the original contract remains in full force, and the suit is expressly or impliedly founded upon it." "In the case of Withers v. Greene, 50 U. S. 9 How. 213, 13 L. ed. 109, the Supreme Court of the United States receded from the ground taken in Thornton v. Wynn, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 183, 6 L. ed. 595, by holding that a partial failure of consideration, growing out of fraud or breach of warranty, may be set up as a defense to an action brought by the vendor. The same rule applies to sales under an executory contract or by sample, and the buyer may rely on the deficiency of value resulting from the failure of the property sold to correspond with the terms of the contract as a reason why he should not be compelled to pay the price in full. Mondel v. Steel, 8 Mees. & W. 858; Babeock v. Trice, 18 Ill. 420; Dailey v. Green, 15 Pa. 118."

We are unable to find in the English cases much support for any discrimination in the application of the above doctrine between sales executed and sales executory, although very many of the modern English cases arise out of sample sales and other contracts of an executory nature. The principal support for it is found in some of the New York cases and in those of a few other States that have followed the lead of the New York court in this respect. There are cases which hold to a modification of some of these forms of remedy, having no bearing, however, on the decision of the present case. Some courts have held that a rejection or rescission is not allowable if the goods tendered are of the kind or species contracted for, even though the quality be inferior; but in this State the doctrine of rescission in cases of warranty has been fully established. Marston v. Knight, 29 Me. 341. In a few cases there is a leaning towards the doctrine that an acceptance becomes a waiver after a long-continued acquiescence on the part of the vendee. 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. pt. 1, pp. 324, 326, 360, 362 et seq.

It is noticeable that in the more modern English cases the courts have preferred to regard executory contracts as based upon a condition precedent, rather than upon warranty. No essential difference of remedy follows from it, though a different style of pleading may be apposite. Instead of a breach of warranty and a suit upon warranty, it becomes, on the new idea, a failure to perform a condition precedent and a suit on the contract. In Leading Cases, before cited, the commentator expresses the theory in an alternative way in these words: "The right of a vendee to rely on a breach of a mere warranty, or a failure to comply with the terms of an executory contract, as a defense to an action for the purchase money, may now be regarded as established in England, and in most of the courts in this country." But the editor at the same time says (p. 334) that "such cases have generally proceeded on the ground of an express or implied warranty. See, also, in 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. pt. 1, the discussion under case of Cutter v. Powell, at pages 18, 20, 22 et seq. Mr. Benjamin inclines to the view taken in the English cases, quoting Lord Abinger as deprecating the prevalent habit of treating a condition precedent as a warranty. Other writers incline favorably towards the views of Lord Abinger as expressed by him in the case of Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 Mees. & W. 399, although admitting that the prevailing theory continues the other way.

The length of this opinion reasonably precludes further discussion of points that may be regarded as merely theoretical. Whether, in the present case, it be a condition or a warranty, and that might be at the election of the defendant to determine as he pleased, we think the defense set up to the action should have been heard upon the ground of a breach of condition, or of warranty, or upon both grounds.

The main question for our decision has not been the subject of much discussion in our own State, although the principle involved has been acted on in a great number of instances, and there have been judicial expressions and rulings affecting it. In Folsom v. Mussey, 8 Me. 400, it is allowed that evidence of consideration may be received in actions between parties to a contract, to reduce the damages. In Herbert v. Ford, 29 Me. 546, the doctrine is approved. Rogers v. Humphrey, 39 Me. 383, directly applies to the present facts. It is there held that "when a party seeks to recover payment for articles delivered under a special contract which he has not fully performed, the damages suffered by such breach may legally be deducted in the same suit." The case of Peabody v. Maguire, 79 Me. 572, 5 New Eng. Rep. 694, in its effect sustains the same principle. It is there decided that in a conditional sale the mere fact of delivery by the vendor without performance by the vendee, nothing being at the time said about the condition, might afford presumptive evidence of the waiver of the condition, but that the fact may be explained and controlled, and whether it be a waiver of the right of title or not would be a question of fact to be ascertained from the testimony. So in the present case, whether acceptance be a waiver of the full performance of the condition precedent or not is likewise a question to be settled upon testimony. The position of parties is reversed in the two cases, but the principle is the same.

The first case in this country, except a Maryland decision to the same effect, and perhaps the leading case in the recognition of the principle that affirmation of quality establishes warranty, is Hastings v. Lovering, 2 Pick. 214, where oil then in Nantucket was sold to be delivered in Boston in ten days, the vendor describing the same to be "prime winter oil." That was in fact as much of an executory contract as is the one under discussion, although not in form such. The point was taken in the trial that the contract, although executory, was settled by a bill of parcels given at delivery, the executory agreement having no further effect: but the court overruled the position. The case is effective on the present question as showing that acceptance has no greater effect as an estoppel in executory than in executed sales. Other Massachusetts cases bear, either directly or indirectly, upon the question. In none of them is there any judicial utterance indicating that executory and executed sales do not, on this question, stand alike. Perley v. Balch, 28 Pick. 283; Dorr v. Fisher, 1 Cush. 274; Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Met. 83; Mizer v. Coburn, 11 Met. 559; Morse v. Brackett, 98 Mass. 205. Several Connecticut cases that are often cited as supporting the theory that description imports warranty, and that the defendant may recoup damages for a breach of contract if the vendor brings a suit, were cases of executory contracts or sales. McAlpin v. Lee, 12 Conn. 129; Kellogg v. Denslow, 14 Conn. 411. And of the same character is the leading case in the Supreme Court of the United States on the same question. Lyon v. Bertram, 61 U. S. 20 How. 150, 15 L. ed. 848. In that case the vendor was to deliver a cargo of flour within three weeks, the price to be according to the inspection to be made at delivery. The contract was in form a sale, but in effect a contract for future sale and delivery. The same deduction may be made from the cases of so many of the States that the rule may be fairly characterized as general; and the same result is producible from the English cases.

The New York court held in earlier cases that warranty in an executory contract did not in ordinary circumstances survive delivery and acceptance. But the doctrine grew up from the theory of law, maintained for a great while by that court, that description of quality is not a warranty of quality. In Leading Cases, before cited, it is said, in distinguishing the New York theory from that of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania: "The authorities in New York assume that calling a thing by a particular name, or designating it as of a certain quality, is no evidence of a warranty or contract that it should be as described." Certainly a thing cannot survive that does not exist. Wilke, J., in Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Met. 90, declared upon that ground that the authorities in New York were without influence upon the question of effect of acceptance in Massachusetts, saying: "Opposed to these authorities are the cases in New York; but these were determined on the assumption that there was no warranty, express or implied, and they therefore have no bearing on the question as to the effect of the inspection of the goods sold by the purchaser."

The last-named rule of the New York cases was found to be so much at variance with the authorities elsewhere that in the case of White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, all previous cases which held that warranty did not follow from description of quality were overruled; and, as a natural, if not necessary, consequence thereof, the tendency of that court seems in later cases to have been progressive towards the adoption of the other rule, that acceptance in cases of executory sales with warranty does not preclude the vendee from afterwards claiming damages against the vendor for a breach of the warranty, if the court has not already arrived at that point. There are late cases in that State, of express warranties, the doctrine of which seems to completely vindicate the position of the defendant in the present case, even should he be obliged to stand or fall upon the interpretation of the law of his contract according to the New York authorities. In Brigg v. Hilton, 99 N. Y. 517, 1 Cent. Rep. 807, and in Fairbank Canning Co. v. Metzger, 118 N. Y. 280, it is declared that an express undertaking to deliver in the future articles of a certain quality was an express warranty of such quality when the articles were afterwards delivered,—a warranty that survived an acceptance of the articles delivered; and that the rule would be the same whether the goods were in existence at the time of contract of sale or were to be manufactured.

Upon the authority of these cases the contract in the case at bar contains an express warranty. An express undertaking to produce a thing is an express warranty of the thing produced.

Re William DEAN, Petitioner to be Admitted to Citizenship.

(....Me.....)

1. While a court, to have cognisance of applications for naturalization or to receive declarations of intention under the federal statute, must possess common-law jurisdiction, it is not necessary that it have all the common-law jurisdiction that pertains to all classes of actions, but merely that it exercise its powers according to the course of the common law.
2. A court, to have jurisdiction of applications for naturalization or to receive declarations of intention under the federal statute, must, in addition to possessing a seal, have a clerk distinct from the judge, charged with the duty of keeping a true record of its doings and afterwards of authenticating them.

3. A court in which the judge thereof is charged with the duty of keeping its records, which must be authenticated by him, though having a recorder charged with the duty of keeping such records when requested by the judge, is not a court having a clerk within the federal statute regulating naturalization, and has no power to receive a declaration of intention to become a citizen.

EXCEPTIONS by petitioner to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for York County (Whitehouse, J.), upon a petition by an alien praying for admission to citizenship, which resulted in the dismissal of the petition. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. F. Lunt, for petitioner:

The term "common-law jurisdiction" means jurisdiction to try and decide causes which were cognizable by the courts of law, under what is known as the common law of England.

People v. McGowan, 77 Ill. 644, 20 Am. Rep. 256.

The Act establishing the court makes it a court of record. This is within the legislative power.

Const. art. 6, § 1.

The Legislature having a right to create and establish a court, certainly has a right to define its legal status.

United States v. Lehman, 89 Fed. Rep. 49.

At common law, the court has the characteristics of a court of record.

NOTE.—Naturalization of aliens; jurisdiction of state courts.

Congress may confer judicial powers on state courts (Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 27, 5 L. ed. 26); and there can be no doubt of the rightful jurisdiction of the state courts in such cases, until extinguished by some Act of Congress. State v. Penney, 10 Ark. 621; Com. v. Fowles, 5 Leigh, 748; Re —, 7 Hill. 141; Re Clark, 18 Barb. 444; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 622, 10 L. ed. 1091; Ex parte Knowles, 5 Cal. 304.

The court of criminal correction, having exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors, under the laws of the State, committed in the City of St. Louis, and which is expressly declared to be a court of record, is a court of common-law jurisdiction, within the meaning of the Act of Congress conferring power on courts to naturalize aliens. United States v. Lehman, 39 Fed. Rep. 49.

Congress intended to confer the power of naturalization on all courts of record of the several States that have power to administer justice under and in accordance with that system of jurisprudence known as the common law. Re Conner, 39 Cal. 98; People v. McGowan, 77 Ill. 649.

Process of naturalization.

The process of naturalization in the mode prescribed by the Act of Congress is a judicial act (Spratt v. Spratt, 20 U. S. 4 Pet. 393, 7 L. ed. 807; 13 L. R. A.

Morgan v. Dudley, 18 B. Mon. 714), and must be exercised by the court itself. Re Clark, 18 Barb. 444.

It is only the preliminary application of an alien declaring his intention under oath which is regarded merely as ministerial, and may be done before the clerk of the court as well as before the court itself. Act of May 26, 1824; Re Butterworth, 1 Woodb. & M. 323. See Conkling, U. S. Ct. Practice, 497.

Naturalization papers.

Where a certificate of naturalization is granted by a court of competent jurisdiction, evidence is inadmissible to show that it was improperly granted or was obtained by false and perjured testimony. Behrensmeier v. Kreitz (Ill.), Jan. 21, 1891.

Where such papers are not issued upon the order of any court, but made out and delivered by a county clerk or justice of the peace, they are void. Ibid.

But a misnomer contained therein does not vitiate the certificate, as the true name may be shown by parol evidence; and a certificate including the names of two persons, although informal, is not invalid. Ibid.

Parol evidence is not admissible to prove that a foreigner has been naturalized. Upon the question whether he is a voter, a certified copy of the record of the court in which he was naturalized is required. State v. O'Hearne, 2 New Eng. Rep. 786, 58 Vt. 718.

No one will contend that our statutory courts, although they may not have all the jurisdiction possessed by the old common-law courts of England, are none the less for that reason courts with common-law jurisdiction.

Laws 1855, chap. 151, § 5.

In Re Langtry, 31 Fed. Rep. 879, Mr. Justice Field expressed doubts of the legality of a declaration of intention made before the clerk of the United States Circuit Court in San Francisco, away from his office and outside the court-house, but in Andres v. Arnold, 6 L. R. A. 238, 77 Mich. 85, by the Supreme Court of Michigan, it was held that it was not necessary that such declaration should be made in the office of the clerk; but 80 Central Law Journal, 53, says that the opinion of the dissenting judge to the contrary appears unanswerable.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application by an alien seeking to become a citizen of the United States. As evidence of the previous declaration of his intention to be naturalized, required by the Act of Congress, the applicant produced a copy of a declaration made by him January 24, 1888, before Edwin J. Cram, recorder of the Municipal Court of the City of Biddeford, attested by "Edwin J. Cram, Recorder." Under the federal statutes, only those courts that are authorized to naturalize are authorized to receive and record this declaration of intention. The question here presented, therefore, is whether the Municipal Court of Biddeford was a court of competent authority, under the laws of the United States, to admit aliens to citizenship. The presiding judge ruled that it was not, and for that reason dismissed the petition.

The Federal Constitution confers upon Congress the power "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." In the exercise of this authority, Congress enacted the Statute of April 14, 1802, prescribing the conditions of naturalization. By that Act the preliminary declaration might be made on oath or affirmation "before the supreme, superior, district, or circuit court of some one of the States." Then follows this provision in the third section of the Act: "And whereas, doubts have arisen whether certain courts of record in some of the States are included within the description of district or circuit courts, be it further enacted that any court of record in any individual State having common-law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk or prothonotary, shall be considered a district court, within the meaning of this Act." In section 2165 of the last revision of the United States statutes, the courts thus authorized to naturalize aliens are specified and described as follows: "A circuit or district court of the United States, or a district or supreme court of the territories, or a court of record of any of the States having common-law jurisdiction and a seal and clerk."

1. Was the Municipal Court of the City of Biddeford, January 24, 1888, a "court of record, having common-law jurisdiction," within the meaning of the Act of Congress of April 14, 1802?

Section 1 of chapter 151 of the Public Laws of 1855, and Acts amendatory thereof, establishing the Municipal Court of Biddeford as constituted January 24, 1888, provide that it "shall be a court of record, with a seal; and said court shall consist of one judge, to be appointed, qualified, and hold his office according to the Constitution; and shall exercise concurrent jurisdiction with justices of the peace and quorum over all matters and things, civil and criminal, within the County of York as are by law within the jurisdiction of justices of the peace and quorum in said county; and original jurisdiction concurrent with the supreme judicial court in all civil actions in which the debt or damages shall not exceed the sum of one hundred dollars; and shall have original jurisdiction concurrent with the supreme judicial court over crimes, offenses and misdemeanors committed in said county which are by laws punishable by fine not exceeding twenty dollars, and by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding three months."

Section 4 provides that "it shall be the duty of the judge of said court to make and keep the records of said court, or cause the same to be made and kept, and to perform all other duties required of similar tribunals; and copies of the records of said court, duly certified by the judge, shall be legal evidence in all courts."

Section 5 is as follows: "The judge shall appoint a recorder, who shall be a justice of the peace and of the quorum, duly qualified, who shall be sworn by said judge, and who shall keep the records of said court when requested so to do by said judge; and, in case of absence from the court-room or sickness of the judge, or whenever requested by him so to do, or when the office of judge shall be vacant, the recorder shall have and exercise all the powers of the judge, and perform all the duties required in this Act of the judge, and generally shall be fully empowered to sign and to issue all processes and papers and do all acts as fully, and with the same effect, as the judge could do were he acting in the premises; and the signature of the recorder, as such, shall be sufficient evidence of his right to act instead of the judge, without any recital of the Act hereinbefore named, authorizing him to act. When the office of judge is vacant, the recorder shall be entitled to the fees; in all other cases he shall be paid by the judge." Chapter 247 of the Special Laws of 1887 provides that the judge shall receive an annual salary of $1,400, which shall be in full for all his services and the services of the recorder.

The "court of record" required by the federal statute is not simply a tribunal that has a recording officer and seal, and in fact keeps a permanent record of its proceedings; for the probate court and the court of the county commissioners would fulfill all of these requirements, and yet neither of these tribunals is deemed to be technically a court of record. It must be an organized judicial tribunal, having attributes and exercising functions independently of the person of the magistrate designated generally to hold it, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. It is distinguishable from the case of a justice of the peace on whom personally certain judicial powers are conferred by law. Gladhill, Petitioner, 8 Met. 168; Anderson, Law Dict.

Two centuries ago, in the case of Groenvelt v. Burnell, 1 Salk. 200, Chief Justice Holt said: "Whenever a power is given to examine, hear, and punish, it is a judicial power, and they in whom it is reposed act as judges; and whenever there is jurisdiction erected with power to fine and imprison, that is a court of record, and what is there done is matter of record." Blackstone adopts this statement, adding that the proceedings of a court of record are enrolled for a perpetual memorial; and then distinguishes a "court not of record" as one that can "hold no plea of matters cognizable by the common law, unless under the value of forty shillings, nor of any forcible injury whatever." 3 Bl. Com. 24. Thus in Woodman v. Somerset County, 87 Me. 38, Chief Justice Shepley says: "A court of record is one which has jurisdiction to fine or imprison, or one having jurisdiction of civil cases above forty shillings, and proceeding according to the course of the common law." It was a distinguishing feature of it that at common law its judgments were reviewable only by writ of error. Accordingly in Gladhill, Petitioner, supra, Chief Justice Shaw says of the Police Court of Lowell in 1844: "We are of opinion that it is a court of record, coming within the description of the Act of Congress. It possesses all the characteristics of a court of record. Section six directs the keeping of a fair record. It is not necessary to decide here whether a justice's court is a court of record. The point is left undecided in Smith v. Morrison, 22 Pick. 480. That a writ of error will lie on a justice's judgment is well settled, and the object of a writ of error is to remove a record. It will not lie to a judgment of a probate court, because not technically a court of record. Probably the result may be, from an examination of all the statutes regulating the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, that their courts will be regarded as courts of record for some purposes, but not in all respects. But we think the decision in this case does not depend upon the legal character of the courts held by justices of the peace. Many powers are vested in the police court of Lowell not conferred on justices of the peace; its constitution is different and its mode of proceeding is different. That this court exercises a common-law jurisdiction there is no doubt: it is authorized to hear and determine all complaints and prosecutions in like manner as justices of the peace, and has jurisdiction of all civil suits and actions cognizable by a justice of the peace." In Ex parte Cregg, 2 Curt. 98, Judge Curtis says: "We see no sound reason to doubt that the police court of Lynn was a court of record having common-law jurisdiction." But it was held that the court did not have a clerk, and therefore did not possess authority to naturalize. To the same effect was the decision in State v. Whittemore, 50 N. H. 245, holding that the police court of Nashua was a court of record having common-law jurisdiction, but, not having a clerk, did not have jurisdiction over applications for naturalization. See also Wheaton v. Fellows, 23 Wend. 375, and Hutkoff v. Demorest, 108 N. Y. 868, 4 Cent. Rep. 773.

But does the Municipal Court of Biddeford have "common-law jurisdiction" to the extent contemplated by the federal statute? With respect to this inquiry, it is proper to remark that we have no national common law in the United States, distinct from that adopted by the several States, each for itself, except so far as the history of the English common law may be involved in the interpretation of the Federal Constitution. The judicial decisions, the usages and customs, of the respective States determine to what extent the common law has been introduced. What is common law in one State may not be so considered in another. Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 658, 8 L. ed. 1079; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 478, 81 L. ed. 512. It must also be remembered that we have no state courts in this country deriving their existence from the common law. They are all established either by the provisions of the organic law or by legislative enactment. Their jurisdiction is not uniform. Some of them have only a special jurisdiction limited as to amounts or subjects in controversy. Of this character are the superior courts of this State; yet it would not be questioned that they have "common-law" jurisdiction. "By 'suits at common law,' in the Constitution," says Judge Story in Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 448, 7 L. ed. 735, "is meant not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized and equitable remedies administered."

Courts of "common-law jurisdiction" are such as "exercise their powers according to the course of the common law. It was not meant that they should have all common-law jurisdiction over every class of subjects, including all civil and criminal matters. If so, few courts could be found in this country having the requisite common-law jurisdiction." People v. McGowan, 77 Ill. 644. So also in Re Conner, 39 Cal. 98, the court says: "The term 'common-law jurisdiction' is capable of no other meaning than jurisdiction to try and decide causes which were cognizable by the courts of law under what is known as the 'common law of England.' The Act does not require that courts shall have all the common-law jurisdiction which pertains to all classes of actions. It is enough if it has 'common-law jurisdiction.'" Again, in United States v. Power, 14 Blatchf. 223, the court says: "The statute of the United States does not require of courts, authorized to entertain applications for naturalization, that they shall have all the jurisdiction possessed by any court of law. If the court may exercise any part of that jurisdiction, it is within the language of the statute, and its meaning as well." To the same effect is Morgan v. Dudley, 18 B. Mon. 698. See also People v. Pease, 30 Barb. 588; Ex parte Burkhardt, 16 Tex. 470, and Mills v. McCabe, 44 Ill. 194.

2. It is admitted that the Municipal Court of Biddeford had a seal; and assuming, without deciding, that it was a court of record, having common-law jurisdiction, within the meaning of the Act of Congress, did it also have a clerk, within the meaning of the federal statute? The language of this statute seems to imply that there may be courts of record having common-law jurisdiction, and a seal, without a clerk, and that such courts are not embraced by the terms of the Act. And this is the construction which it has received from eminent judicial authority. The court must have a clerk distinct from the judge; not necessarily an officer denominated "clerk," but a permanent "recording officer, charged with the duty of keeping a true record of its doings, and afterwards of authenticating them." Shaw, Ch. J., in Gladhill, Petitioner, Ex parte Cregg, and State v. Whittemore, supra. The court contemplated by the Act of Congress has an organized existence. It is impersonal. The judge is one of the constituent parts of the organization; the clerk is another and a separate and an independent element. The essential function of the clerk is to make and keep the records, and give them legal verification by his attestation and the use of the seal.

By those sections of the Act establishing the Municipal Court of Biddeford, above quoted, the responsible duty of making and keeping the records of the court is imposed upon the judge and not upon the recorder. There is no duty of making and keeping the records imposed upon the recorder by law. He is to keep the records of the court only when requested so to do by the judge. Furthermore, the recorder of this court cannot authenticate by his attestation any copies of records "made and kept" by the judge, or kept by himself at the request of the judge. Only such copies of the records as are "duly certified by the judge shall be legal evidence in all courts." The authority to appoint a recorder was conferred upon the judge, not for the purpose of creating a fixed and permanent clerical office distinct and separate from that of the judge, but primarily to provide for the judge a substitute who should be empowered to act in his stead in the contingencies named in the Act. "His signature as recorder is sufficient evidence of his right to act instead of the judge." When thus acting in a judicial capacity, exercising the powers and performing the duties of the judge, the recorder is the court, and must personally make, keep, and authenticate the records of the court. The recorder's court has no clerk other than the recorder himself. Accordingly, in the attestation of the copy of William Dean's declaration of intention, the signature of "Edwin J. Cram, Recorder," by the very terms of the Act, is presumptive evidence that he was acting instead of the judge in some of the contingencies named in the Act.

The process of naturalization, in the mode it is required to be performed by the federal statutes, is a judicial act. Spratt v. Spratt, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 393, 7 L. ed. 897. And "the importance and value of this privilege of citizenship, which is conclusively and finally bestowed by the act of the court having jurisdiction, should prevent us from allowing less than its full weight to any requirement by Congress which tends to restrict this power to those tribunals which may be supposed most competent to exercise it. Certainly, there would seem to be no propriety in intrusting to a court which, in the exercise of its common-law jurisdiction, cannot pass finally on any matter of law or fact affecting property to the amount of one dollar, to make a final decision upon all questions of law or fact involved in an application for this great right, so as to make an absolute and unimpeachable grant of it." Curtis, J., in Ex parte Cregg, above cited.

We are accordingly of opinion that the Municipal Court of the City of Biddeford, January 24, 1888, did not have a clerk, within the intent and meaning of the federal statute, and therefore had no jurisdiction over applications for naturalization, and no authority to receive and record the declaration of intention made by William Dean. The application for admission to citizenship was properly dismissed.

Exceptions overruled.

Mack*, 43 Hun. 75; Gay v. Gay, 10 Paige, 300, 4 L. ed. 1015; Smith v. Fox, 48 N. Y. 674; Davidson v. Alfaro, 80 N. Y. 660; Shipman v. Lansing, 25 Hun. 280.

If Clark is insolvent and possesses less than $1,500 of personal property, the money due to him on this appeal bond could not be applied to the satisfaction of the Fairbank, Morse & Co's judgment and to allow Sullivan to circumvent the Exemption Laws is a fraud upon Clark and the Exemption Laws of this State.

Smith v. Hill, 8 Gray, 572.

Corliss, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The demurrer of plaintiff to counterclaim of defendant Sullivan having been sustained, he challenges by this appeal the ruling of the trial court in this respect. It is not pretended that the answer does not state a good cause of action in favor of defendant Sullivan and against the plaintiff; but it is insisted by plaintiff that, as the plaintiff's cause of action is a joint debt of defendant Sullivan with his co-defendant King, and as the claim sought to be offset against it is the debt of the plaintiff to the defendant Sullivan alone, it is not the proper subject of counterclaim; that Sullivan must sue upon it in an independent action. The complaint states a cause of action arising out of the execution of an undertaking on appeal by Mead as principal and the two defendants herein, King and Sullivan, as sureties, followed by the affirmance of the judgment appealed from. The claim set forth in the answer is a judgment recovered against the plaintiff, Clark, by Fairbanks, Morse & Co., which was assigned to defendant Sullivan before the commencement of this action. The liability of the two sureties on the undertaking is joint. No words expressing a several liability appearing on the face of the instrument, it was the joint, and not the joint and several, obligation of the parties executing it. Wood v. Fisk, 63 N. Y. 245; 1 Parsons, Cont. 11; 1 Story, Cont. § 53; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 409; Pickersgill v. Lahens, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 140, 21 L. ed. 119.

Statutory enactment in this State has left this rule unaltered, where at least one of the parties liable upon the obligation is a mere surety. Comp. Laws, §§ 3425, 3574.

The counterclaim, therefore, cannot be sustained under the Statute. The statutory counterclaim "must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action." Comp. Laws, § 4915. See Roberts v. Donocan (Cal.) 9 Pac. Rep. 180; Wood v. Brush, 72 Cal. 224.

No several judgment against the defendant Sullivan could be rendered. Had plaintiff failed to make his co-defendant, King, a party, this defect of parties would have abated the action as thus commenced, the defect being legally brought to the attention of the court by demurrer or by answer, according as the defect might or might not appear upon the face of the complaint. Although only one of two joint debtors is served, the judgment must be against both jointly, to be enforced against their joint property and the separate property of the defendant served. Comp. Laws, § 4901, subd. 1. The plaintiff having no right to a several judgment against defendant Sullivan, the latter could not, therefore, under the Statute, offset his separate claim against the plaintiff. But we may look elsewhere for the proper rule to govern this question. The right to offset a claim is recognized by equity independent of any statute. We are very clear that the facts alleged in the answer bring this case within this principle of equity jurisprudence. The defendant avers the insolvency of the plaintiff. This creates an equity, for it is unconscionable that the plaintiff should insist that the defendant pay him, and then leave the defendant powerless because of plaintiff's insolvency to enforce his (defendant's) claim against the plaintiff. But a further equity appears. Defendant alleges the insolvency of his principal in the undertaking. Therefore not only will he be without the ability to collect his judgment from the plaintiff, but he will be without ability to reimburse himself out of his principal, who should save him from all loss. It would not be creditable to an enlightened administration of justice to deny the operation of this equitable rule under these facts, which appeal so strongly to the conscience. It is well established that the surety, when sued upon the joint obligation of himself and his principal, may offset the separate claim of the latter against the plaintiff in case of insolvency. Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 560; Becker v. Northway, 44 Minn. 61.

Certainly this court would be open to the criticism of sacrificing substance to form if it refused to allow the surety to set off his own separate demand against the plaintiff when the latter is insolvent. May he reach out, and, seizing without assignment, interpose this principal's claim as an offset, and yet is he powerless, under the same circumstances, to plead his own demand as a counterclaim? Had defendant Sullivan been principal, his claim, upon the favorable consideration of a court of equity, would have been trifling when compared with that high claim to the favor of equity which all the adjudications agree is the peculiar property of a surety. One of the very elements of the law is that he is a favorite of a court of equity; and yet, as a principal debtor, Sullivan could have offset this separate claim against the plaintiff under the Statute without showing any equity, because he would have been severally as well as jointly liable to plaintiff on the undertaking under our Statute, and therefore a several judgment between him and plaintiff could have been rendered. But as surety, the favorite of the court, with strong equities pleading in his behalf, he may not, it has been decided, in this case, even under an equitable rule, have the same measure of relief and justice. The doctrine on which that decision must rest can have no place in the more advanced system of jurisprudence, which, unlike the old system,—before equity achieved its memorable triumph, ere reform in procedure had supplanted technical rules,—subordinates in large measure every other consideration to the accomplishment of justice. It is true that it sometimes has been thought that insolvency was not sufficient to create such an equity as would warrant a departure from the statutory rule. See 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. pt. 1, p. 355, and cases. But the doctrine of Lindsay v. Jackson, 2 Paige, 581, 2 L. ed. 1088, commends itself with greater force to the reason and the conscience of man. Said Chancellor Walworth, in this leading case: "There is a natural equity that cross-demands should be offset against each other, and that the balance only should be recovered. This was the rule of the civil law, and it is now adopted and preserved as the law of those countries where the principles of the civil law prevail. . . . By the common law of England, however, this natural equity was not allowed or enforced in the courts of law, but each party was left to recover his demand in a separate action. As a general rule the court of chancery followed the rule of law; and after the Statute had permitted set-offs to a certain extent in suits at law, this court also adopted and acted on that principle. But the courts of chancery, even before the Statute, recognized the principle of natural equity, and acted upon it, in cases where the law could not give a remedy in a separate suit in consequence of the insolvency of one of the parties." To same effect are Smith v. Felton, 43 N. Y. 419; Seligmann v. Heller Bros. Cloth. Co. 69 Wis. 410; Becker v. Northway, 44 Minn. 61; Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 560; Davidson v. Alfaro, Id. 660; Hiner v. Newton, 80 Wis. 640-644; Hobbs v. Duff, 23 Cal. 597-629.

We are not called upon to decide on this appeal whether it was proper for the defendant to urge his equity by answer, or whether he should not have filed his complaint in equity to enforce his equitable set-off. Nor are we asked to determine whether he should have waited until the recovery of judgment against him in this action, and then by motion or by action had one judgment set off against the other. Only the question of right has been discussed on this appeal. What is the proper procedure has not been touched. It might be well in passing, however, to refer to the fact that in New York, where the provisions of the Code relating to this question are the same as in this State, the practice, as apparently sanctioned by the courts, has been to insist upon this equity by answer. Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 560; Smith v. Felton, 43 N. Y. 419. This is true of Minnesota also, but the Statute there was somewhat different. Becker v. Northway, 44 Minn. 61. See also Dempsey v. Rhodes, 93 N. C. 120. But see Duff v. Hobbs, 19 Cal. 646.

It was contended on the oral argument that equity would not decree the offsetting of defendant's judgment against plaintiff's claim because the plaintiff's claim was exempt; that, in effect, this would be the seizure of his exempt property to pay a judgment against him. The point is not without force, but it is not involved on this appeal, as there is nothing to show that plaintiff has not a large amount of property in excess of his exemptions. An insolvent may own a large estate. No cases were cited on this point. An investigation of it has brought to light the following decisions, which we cite for the benefit of counsel without further comment: Puett v. Beard, 86 Ind. 172; Temple v. Scott, 3 Minn. 419 (Gil. 306); Curlee v. Thomas, 74 N. C. 51; Duff v. Wells, 7 Heisk. 17; Wilson v. McElroy, 32 Pa. 82.

It was also said that no equity could arise in favor of defendant, because he purchased the judgment he now seeks to offset with knowledge of plaintiff's insolvency, and for the express purpose of using the judgment as an offset, and that plaintiff paid practically nothing for it. These facts do not appear on the face of the answer to which plaintiff has demurred. A reply embracing them would, if sustained by proof, or demurred to, raise this question. We do not decide it now.

The order appealed from is reversed, plaintiff to have ten days after the remittitur is filed in which to reply to defendant's offset.

All concur.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Columbiana County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas establishing a mortgage as a valid lien upon the property of James N. Hape, and directing its payment out of the proceeds of such property in the hands of an assignee for the benefit of his creditors. Affirmed.

Statement by Williams, Ch. J.:

On the 1st day of December, 1885, James M. Hape executed a mortgage, on all of his real estate situated in Columbiana County, to Salathiel Betz, to secure an indebtedness of $3,000 due in one year, with 6 per cent interest. Josephine M. Hape, the wife of the mortgagor, joined in the execution of the mortgage. On the 21st day of December, 1885, the mortgage was delivered to the recorder of the county for record, and was duly recorded. On the 16th day of December, 1885, said James M. Hape, who then resided in Columbiana County, made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to Charles N. Snyder. The deed of assignment, which embraced all the property, real and personal, of the assignor (including that mortgaged to Betz), was executed, attested, and acknowledged in conformity to the requirements of the Statute relating to conveyances of real estate, and was filed in the probate court of the county on the 17th day of December, 1885, when the assignee qualified, and entered upon the execution of his trust. He thereafter filed his petition in the probate court of that county, to have the validity and priority of the liens determined, and the property sold. Betz, who was made a party defendant, filed an answer, setting up his mortgage, and asking for its payment out of the proceeds of the sale. The cause, after having proceeded to judgment in the probate court, was appealed to the court of common pleas, where it was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, substantially as above stated, upon which that court adjudged the mortgage to be a valid lien, and ordered the amount found to be due on it to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, before any distribution to the general creditors. This judgment was reversed by the circuit court, which held that, as the mortgage was not filed for record until after the deed of assignment was filed in the probate court, it was invalid as against the assignee, and not entitled to preference over the general creditors. Whether there was error in that judgment is the question presented to this court.

Messrs. Wallace & Billingsley, for plaintiff in error:

An unrecorded mortgage is a lien as against an assignee of the mortgagor in trust for the benefit of creditors; he is neither a creditor nor purchaser for value.

Registry of mortgage as notice.

Equitable estates and interests, as well as legal, are embraced within the intent and operation of the Recording Acts. Digman v. McCollum, 47 Mo. 372; Tarbell v. West, 86 N. Y. 287. See Doyle v. Teas, 5 Ill. 202; Alexander v. Webster, 6 Md. 359; Alderson v. Ames, 6 Md. 52; General Ins. Co. v. United States Ins. Co. 10 Md. 517; Wilder v. Brooks, 10 Minn. 50; *Dickinson v. The record becomes constructive notice, not only that the instrument exists, but of its contents, and of all the estates, rights and interests, legal and equitable, created by it, or arising from its provisions (2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 655; Burrell v. Bull, 3 Sandf. Ch. 15, 7 L. ed. 759; but where any of the preliminaries of execution, acknowledgment, and certificate attached are entirely omitted or defectively performed, it is a mere voluntary act, of no effect as to rights of subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers. See 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 652.

The registry of a mortgage is notice to all subsequent purchasers and mortgagees of the lien created thereby. Teft v. Munson, 63 Barb. 36.

It is notice of the contents of the instrument and not of any secret condition, trust or equity.

Mears, W. G. Wells and Charles N. Snyder, in propria persona, for defendant in error: .

The principle running through all the cases since the Recording Act of 1831 is that the subsequently acquired legal rights of title of third persons cannot be displaced by any unrecorded mortgage, a defectively executed mortgage, or any specific though merely equitable lien.

1. Cases where junior recorded mortgages with notice were preferred to prior unrecorded mortgages:

Stansell v. Roberts, 13 Ohio, 149; Mayham v. Coombs, 14 Ohio, 429.

2. Cases where a lien by judgment has been preferred to a prior unrecorded mortgage, a defectively executed mortgage, or a contract for a mortgage:

Public records, by construction of law, are notice to all persons of what they contain. Their contents are matters of public knowledge, because the law requires them to be kept, authorizes them to be used, and secures to all persons having access to them that knowledge of them may be public; and thence imputes to all interested persons that knowledge the opportunity to acquire which it has provided. *Neslin v. Williams, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The common-law rule, that an assignee for the benefit of creditors succeeds only to the rights of the assignor in the property at the time of the assignment, and takes it subject to all equities and liens which could have been asserted against it had the assignment not been made, is not without important exceptions in this State, growing out of our legislation. It is well settled that chattel mortgages which fail to conform, in any substantial requirement, to the provisions of the Statute, relating to their execution or registry, though good against the mortgagor and the property while it is retained by him, are ineffectual as liens upon the property after it has passed into the hands of an assignee for the benefit of creditors of the mortgagor, under an assignment made subse-

A knowledge of the statutes, at least as to their leading features of similarity and dissimilarity, is essentially necessary to a proper understanding of the American Law of Registration. See 2 Pom. Who is a purchaser for value.

A purchaser for a valuable consideration, within the meaning of the Acts, is one who has paid the consideration of the conveyance, or some part thereof, or has parted with something of value upon the face of the conveyance. 3 Washb. Real. Prop. 3d ed. 299; Tourville v. Nalsh, 3 P. Wms. 306; Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk. 630; Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304; Webster v. Van Steenberg, 46 Barb. 211; Weaver v. Barden, 49 N. Y. 286; De-lancey v. Stearns, 66 N. Y. 157; Dickerson v. Tillinghast, 4 Paige, 215, 3 L. ed. 409; Westbrook v. Gleason, 79 N. Y. 23.

It is settled everywhere that unrecorded assignments of mortgages are void as against subsequent purchasers, whose interests may be affected thereby, and whose conveyances are duly recorded, provided such assignments are embraced by the Requent to the execution of the mortgage. Hanes v. Tiffany, 25 Ohio St. 549; Blandy v. Benedict, 42 Ohio St. 295. In Hanes v. Tiffany, it was contended in behalf of the mortgagee that, as the mortgage was good against the mortgagor, it was also good against the assignee for the benefit of his creditors; for the latter, it was claimed, stood in no better situation than the assignor. In disposing of this contention, White, J., in the opinion of the court, said: "The correctness of this position at common law is admitted, but not so under the Statute." It was held in Blandy v. Benedict that where the affidavit, which the Statute requires the mortgagee to make on his chattel mortgage before filing the same with the proper officer, was defective in the statement of the liability the mortgage was given to secure, but the mortgage was otherwise properly executed and filed, and the mortgagor subsequently made an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, the mortgage was not entitled to priority over the general creditors under the assignment, although the assignment contained a provision expressly excepting from its operation all liens, and though the mortgage was good as against the mortgagor, constituting a valid lien while the property remained in his possession. With respect to the purpose of that provision of the assignment which excepted all liens from its operation, and its effect upon the assignment and the rights of the creditors, it is said in the opinion by McIlvaine, J.: "We think there can be no doubt that the intention was to secure the mortgagees the full amount of their liens, to the extent that such liens were valid as against the assignor. Can such purpose be accomplished by such means? We think not. Undoubtedly these mortgages were valid as against the assignor, but void as against his creditors."

These decisions rest upon the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Statute, which enacts that such mortgages, when not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the property mortgaged, shall be void as against the creditors of the mortgagor, unless the mortgage, or a true copy, with the necessary affidavit of the mortgagee thereon, as prescribed by the Statute, be deposited with the proper officer. The right of the creditors to subject the property to the payment of their claims is in no way affected by such void mortgages, and an assignment of the property by the mortgagor for the benefit of his creditors clothes the assignee, not only with the assignor's title to the property, but also with all the rights of the creditors with respect to it. As was said in Blandy v. Benedict: "By the assignment, the rights of the creditors passed to the assignee as matter of law," and they are thereafter to be worked out through him, in the administration of his trust. Up to the time of the assignment, the creditors might seize the property by ording Acts. Bacon v. Van Schoonhoven, 87 N. Y. 446; Decker v. Bolce, 83 N. Y. 215; Swartz v. Leist, 18 Ohio St. 419; Yerger v. Barz, 58 Iowa, 77; *Henderson v. Legislative intent, how ascertained.

In ascertaining the intent of the Legislature in the enactment of a statute, courts will take judicial notice of such contemporaneous history as led up to and probably induced the passage of the law. Stout v. Grant County Comrs. 5 West. Rep. 635, 107 Ind. 343.

Result of failure to record.

A statute which has for its purpose the better security and repose of titles may postpone one who voluntarily neglects to avail himself of the Registry Acts, which enable him to give notice to all the world of his claim, to the claim of a subsequent purchaser who acted on the faith of a public record. Kenyon v. Stewart, 44 Pa. 179; Jackson v. Lamphire, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 280, 7 L. ed. 679; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Talbot, 12 West. Rep. 239, 113 Ind. 373.

The protection of the Recording Act is not confined to a subsequent purchaser immediately from the same grantor; but applies to one who takes from him through mesne conveyances. Fallas v. Pierce, 30 Wis. 479. See Ledyard v. Butler, 9 Paige, 132, 4 L. ed. 637.

The younger recorded mortgage could not have preference to the older unrecorded mortgage. To have that advantage the younger must both be taken in good faith and be first recorded. This was always the rule between grantor and grantee, by deed, and between mortgagor and mortgagee. Fort v. Burch, 5 Denio, 191. See Jackson v. Given, 8 Johns. 137; Jackson v. Van Valkenburgh, 8 Cow. 264.

A mortgage is within the provisions of the Act to register mortgages, which extends to every deed of mortgage, or conveyance in the nature of a mortgage, of or for any lands, tenements or hereditaments. Stagg*, 2 Johns. 510, 423; Breese v. Bange, 2 E. D. Smith, 474.

attachment or other process, and their lien, so acquired, would undoubtedly be superior to such a mortgage; and, in the language of McIlvaine, J., in Blandy v. Benedict: "Every right which the creditors might have asserted against the property before the assignment, the assignee is bound to secure for their benefit after the assignment." The assignment, therefore, as effectually fixes the rights of the creditors to the property, and establishes their priority over the mortgage, as if they had taken the property on execution or attachment. This operation of the assignment upon the rights of the creditors must, of course, be the same, whether the property embraced in it be real or personal, or both; and hence, upon the principle established by the cases referred to, the creditors are entitled to priority over a mortgage of real property which has not been deposited for record when the assignment is made, unless, under our Recording Acts, the effect of the failure to deposit the mortgage for record is substantially different from that which results from the like failure to properly file a chattel mortgage. Is there a substantial difference in this respect?

The Statute regulating the execution and registry of mortgages of real property does not, in terms, declare that such mortgages, when not deposited for record, shall be void as against the creditors of the mortgagor; but it does enact that they shall be recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which the mortgaged premises are situated, and that they shall take effect from the time the same are delivered to the recorder of the proper county for record. Mortgages of real property, which are not so filed for record, like unfilled chattel mortgages, are good between the parties; and, while the latter are declared void as to creditors, the former do not take effect as to third persons until they are filed for record. A mortgage which has no effect is no better than a void one; for a void mortgage is simply without effect. It has been held as often as the question has been presented, and it has been made in a variety of forms, as well as in numerous cases, that mortgages of real property have no effect, either at law or in equity, until they are delivered to the recorder of the proper county for record, as against third persons acquiring a legal interest in, or lien upon, the property. In Stansell v. Roberts, 13 Ohio, 148, it was decided that, as between a prior unrecorded mortgage and a subsequent one which was recorded, the latter had priority. In the cases of Mayham v. Coombs, 14 Ohio, 429; Jackson v. Luce, Id. 514; White v. Denman, 16 Ohio, 60; Holliday v. Franklin Bank of Columbus, Id. 588; White v. Denman, 1 Ohio St. 110, and Fosdick v. Barr, 3 Ohio St. 471,—it was held that an unrecorded mortgage, or one defectively executed, so as not to be entitled to record, was not entitled to preference over a subsequent judgment recovered against the mortgagor. It was not doubted that such mortgages were good as against the mortgagor, and but for the Statute would have been entitled to preference over the judgments, under the general rule that the lien of a judgment attaches only to the interest which the debtor has in the property at the time of its rendition. But, as is said in the last case cited above, while such unrecorded instruments are good and effectual between the parties, they are "entirely nugatory as to third parties, both at law and in equity, until they are recorded." It was held in Bloom v. Noggle, 4 Ohio St. 45, that a valid agreement in writing for a mortgage on real property gave to the party entitled to the mortgage no priority over the general creditors under an assignment made by the other contracting party for the benefit of his creditors. And in Erwin v. Shuey, 8 Ohio St. 510, this court held that a mortgage of lands, defective because not under seal, but otherwise properly executed and recorded, created no lien, in favor of the mortgagee, against an assignee under a general assignment, subsequently made by the mortgagor for the benefit of his creditors, although the assignee had notice of the mortgage at the time of the assignment.

These cases, like those of Hanes v. Tiffany, and Blandy v. Benedict, supra, afford instances of the exceptions, which obtain in this State, to the rule of the common law that an assignee for the benefit of creditors takes the property assigned subject to all equities which could have been enforced against it in the hands of the assignor at the time of the assignment; and it is shown by them that the exceptions grow out of the similar effect given to the recording statutes applicable to the different classes of mortgages. In Bloom v. Noggle, Ranney, J., speaking of the effect of the Statutes upon the rules of the common law, and the rights of the parties before and since their enactment, said: "If the case could be decided upon general principles, the right of the complainants to the relief they seek would seem to us as clear as it now seems clear that it cannot be given consistently with statutory provisions bearing upon the questions stated. Upon general equity principles, unaffected by statutory provisions, an agreement in writing for a mortgage is a valid contract, fixing a specific lien upon the property agreed to be mortgaged, and will be specifically enforced by a court of chancery, against the party and all subsequent purchasers from him with notice, as well as against any general assignment, either voluntary or by operation of law, for the benefit of his creditors. These principles may be regarded as well settled, and the jurisdiction of courts of equity in such cases has been exercised, without question, from a very early period, as is abundantly shown by the cases cited in argument. It rests upon the same foundation, and has all the reasons for its support that exist in favor of a like interference upon contracts for the execution and delivery of absolute deeds. As between the parties to such contract, the agreement is valid and effectual in this State, and we see no reason to doubt that a specific performance may be enforced by our courts of chancery, in the same manner and to the same extent that such relief has been given in England and other States of the Union. But while these principles and remedies have their full application and effect, as between the parties to such a contract, we are clear in the opinion that no effect whatever can be given to it consistently with section 7 of the Act of June 1, 1881 (Swan's Rev. Stat. 310), to provide for the proof, acknowledgment, and recording of deeds, etc., as against third persons who have subsequently acquired the legal title to, or lien at law upon, the property to which it relates. By the positive provisions of that section, as construed by the Declaratory Act of March 16, 1898 (Swan's Rev. Stat. 311), and repeated decisions of this court, as against such third persons, mortgages have no effect, either at law or in equity, until delivered to the recorder of the proper county for record. "To give them any effect before," says the learned judge, "as against the persons intended to be protected by the Statute, would be to repeal it. It was not made for the mortgagor, and therefore, as to him, the record of the mortgage was wholly unnecessary; but it was designed to protect third persons who might acquire legal interests in, or liens upon, the property. As to them, the record was made conclusive; and they are only bound to regard such mortgage liens as the record discloses at the time their rights accrue. The principle deducible from all the cases is that the legal rights of such persons cannot be displaced, at the instance of the holder of a prior unrecorded mortgage, or contract for a mortgage, although acquired with notice of such mortgage, or of the existence of such contract; the object of the law being to avoid all vexed questions of notice, actual or constructive, in determining priorities of lien."

We have quoted at some length from the opinion in Bloom v. Noggle, because we think the case before us comes within the principle established by it, and subsequently approved in Erwin v. Shuey, supra, which is that the essential condition to the validity of a mortgage of real property, as against an assignee of the mortgagor for the benefit of his creditors, is that the mortgage shall be deposited for record with the proper officer before the assignment takes effect. It can make no difference, in the application of the principle, whether the want of such record, or deposit for record, results from the defective execution of the mortgage, by reason of which it is not entitled to record, or from the voluntary withholding from the record of a mortgage properly executed. There can be no doubt that an assignment for the benefit of creditors operates as a conveyance, and not as a mere power. Nothing remains in the assignor but the incidental right to discharge the trust by the payment of the debts, or to claim whatever residue may remain after the debts are paid. That the deed of assignment, when properly executed, clothes the assignee with the legal title, is settled by the cases just referred to, and, according to those decisions, against the legal title thus acquired, the prior unrecorded mortgage cannot prevail. If the conveyance was made directly to the creditors, for the payment or security of their debts, it could not be claimed that either their title or their rights under the conveyance would be displaced or affected by a prior unrecorded mortgage, nor by its subsequent record; and their rights, we apprehend, are none the less when the conveyance is made to the assignee for their benefit. The subsequent record of the mortgage could, of course, give it no validity as against rights which had been acquired before. We therefore hold that a mortgage of real property, which has not been deposited with the recorder of the proper county for record, before an assignment of the property by the mortgagor for the benefit of his creditors takes effect, is not a valid lien upon the property, as against the assignee or the creditors, nor does it become so by being subsequently recorded. It has been suggested, though it is not so contended by counsel in the argument, that the assignment lost its priority, because the deed of assignment was not deposited for record with the recorder of the county, while, soon after it was filed with the probate court, the mortgage was duly recorded. The record now under review does not show that the deed of assignment was not filed with the recorder. But, assuming that it was not, does the result suggested follow? The consequences of the failure to record deeds differ from those attending a like failure with respect to mortgages. As to deeds, the Statute simply declares that until recorded, or filed for record, they "shall be deemed fraudulent, so far as relates to a subsequent bona fide purchaser, having at the time of purchase no knowledge of the existence of such former deed." If it were conceded, though we do not deem it necessary to so decide, that by recording his mortgage, after the deed of assignment was properly filed in the probate court, the mortgagee, Betz, then became a subsequent bona fide purchaser, within the meaning of the Statute, it was still essential, in order to bring him within its protection, that at the time of filing his mortgage for record he had no knowledge of the assignment; and this it is incumbent upon him to show. He makes no claim of that kind in his answer, and the record of the courts below is silent on the subject.

But is it essential to the validity of an assignment of real property, as to third persons, that the deed should be recorded in the office of the county recorder? As a deed conveying real property, it falls within the class of instruments whose record is provided for by section 4134 of the Revised Statutes, and is subject to its provisions, unless controlled by other statutory regulations made especially applicable to such assignments. The whole subject of assignments by insolvent debtors for the benefit of their creditors is specifically provided for, and regulated, in detail, by chapter 4 of title 2 of the Revised Statutes. By the first section of that chapter (§ 6335), it is made the duty of every assignee, within ten days after the delivery of the assignment to him, to cause it to be filed in the probate court of the county in which the assignor resided at the time of its execution; and it enacts that every "such assignment shall take effect only from the time of its delivery to the probate judge, and the exact time of such delivery shall be indorsed thereon by the probate judge, who shall immediately note the filing on the journal of the court; and it may be delivered by the assignor to the probate judge, either before or after its delivery to the assignee." Upon the filing of the assignment, the assignee is required to enter into a bond for the faithful performance of his duties; and from that time the administration of the assignment becomes a pending proceeding in the probate court, and so continues until the trust is fully executed. Notice that the assignee has qualified is required to be given by publication, and notice must also be given by publication, or otherwise, of various steps in the proceedings. The probate court is invested with complete jurisdiction of the whole subject matter of the assignment, and of its administration to final completion. Its records, equally with those of the courts of common pleas, and of the records of deeds and mortgages, are constructive notice of what they are required to contain. It is a rule of construction that special statutory provisions for particular cases operate as exceptions to general provisions which might include the particular cases. The object of those provisions of section 6335, to which we have referred, was not, we think, simply to provide when and how assignments should become operative as between the parties to the instrument. They were not necessary for that purpose. As between them, the conveyance is complete without a compliance with those provisions. Their design evidently was to fix definitely a time from which such instruments should take effect as to all persons. And, it having been so specially enacted that assignments for the benefit of creditors shall take effect from the time of their delivery to the probate judge, the courts are not at liberty to annex, as a further condition to their taking effect, that they shall also be deposited with the recorder of deeds. This conclusion is sustained by the decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Guilford v. Childs, 22 Pick. 484, which involved the interpretation of statutes very similar to ours.

STATE NATIONAL BANK, Respnt.

1. A bank which has received for collection a check which it forwards to its correspondent for that purpose, cannot fulfill its obligation to the owner by delivering to him the correspondent's draft on a third person, drawn and used for transmitting the proceeds of the check, not to the owner but to itself, and which has become worthless because of the insolvency of both drawer and drawee.
2. The courts of New York will construe the common law as applicable to a contract made and to be performed in another State, according to their own precedents, although they will follow the courts of such other State in the construction of its statute law.
3. The sending of a check by a New York bank to a Tennessee bank for collection in Texas does not constitute the contract for collection a Tennessee contract.

(June 2, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of the New York County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the proceeds of a draft which had been sent to defendant for collection. Reversed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

This action was brought to recover the proceeds of a draft for $478.57 sent for collection by the plaintiff to the defendant, and paid to the defendant's correspondents. The trial resulted in the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount demanded. Upon appeal to the general term, the judgment entered upon the verdict was reversed, and a new trial ordered. From the order of reversal the plaintiff appealed to this court. There is no controversy as to the facts, which for the most part were set forth in a stipulation read upon the trial. They may be summarized as follows: The plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, and engaged in the business of banking in the City of New York; and the defendant is a corporation organized under the National Banking Act, and doing business in the City of Memphis. For two years prior to the 18th day of November, 1884, the plaintiff had been accustomed to send checks, notes, and drafts to the defendant for collection, including such as were drawn upon persons residing at a distance, in the State of Texas and elsewhere. The commercial paper was inclosed in letters, consisting of printed forms, filled out by the insertion in writing of the date, the name of the defendant's cashier, and a description of the inclosure. The checks and drafts were collected by the defendant, and the proceeds were remitted to the plaintiff, less one fourth of 1 per cent, the defendant's commission, and the expense incurred in making distant collections. On November 10, 1884, the plaintiff was the owner and holder of a check for $478.57 dated November 6, 1884, drawn upon the City National Bank of Dallas, Tex., by A.

D. Aldridge & Co., and payable to the order of Henry Levy & Son. This check was indorsed by the plaintiff to the defendant for collection, and was sent to the latter in the usual course of business. The defendant received the check on November 13, 1884, and on that day indorsed it for collection, and forwarded it by mail to the firm of Adams & Leonard, at Dallas, Tex. They were at the time, and had been for many years, bankers in good standing at Dallas, and the correspondents of the defendant. They received the check on November 17, 1884, and on that day duly presented it for payment to the Bank upon which it was drawn, and it was immediately paid, and the proceeds were received by them. They then remitted to the defendant a sight draft for the amount collected, drawn by them upon Jemison & Co., of the City of New York. This draft was sent by the defendant for collection to the First National Bank of New York, and on November 24, 1884, was presented to Jemison & Co., who, in the mean time, had suspended payment. The draft was accordingly protested, and returned to the defendant. Thereupon the defendant, on November 28, 1884, mailed the protested draft to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff refused to accept it. Adams & Leonard had failed in business before the draft on Jemison & Co. was presented for payment. The only evidence offered by the defendant in opposition to these facts was proof of a decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in the case of Bank of Louisville v. First Nat. Bank of Knoxville, 8 Baxt. 101, which will be referred to in the opinion.

Mr. Charles E. Hughes, with Mr. William Tharp, for appellant:

A bank receiving a bill of exchange in one State for collection from a drawee residing in another State, in the absence of a special agreement, is liable for a loss occasioned by the default of its correspondents, selected to effect the collection.

Allen v. Merchants Bank, 22 Wend. 215; Montgomery County Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459; Commercial Bank of Pa. v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 203; Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y. 570; Naser v. First Nat. Bank, 116 N. Y. 498; Exchange Nat. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Third Nat. Bank of New York, 112 U. S. 282, 28 L. ed. 724; Titus v. Mechanics Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. L. 588; Wingate v. Mechanics Bank, 10 Pa. 104; Reeves v. Ohio State Bank, 8 Ohio St. 465; Tyson v. State Bank, 6 Blackf. 225; Simpson v. Waldbury, 6 West. Rep. 158, 63 Mich. 499; Power v. Bank, 6 Mont. 251, 35 Alb. L. J. 185; Mackerey v. Ramsays, 9 Clark & F. 818.

The liability of a collecting bank extends not only to the acts of its correspondents by which the collection is defeated, but to a failure to remit the proceeds of the commercial paper when collected.

Bradstreet v. Emerson, 72 Pa. 124.

The insolvency of its correspondents furnishes no excuse for the defendant's failure to remit the proceeds of the collection.

Mackerey v. Ramsays, Simpson v. Waldbury, Bradstreet v. Emerson and Reeves v. Ohio State Bank, supra; Hoover v. Wise, 91 U. S. 308, 23 18 L. R. A.

L. ed. 392. See also Exchange Nat. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Third Nat. Bank of New York, supra.

The draft drawn by Adams & Leonard to the order of the defendant and tendered by the latter to the plaintiff was not a remittance of the proceeds of the collection.

Simpson v. Waldbury, supra; People v. Bank of Dansville, 39 Hun. 187.

If the question involved were to be decided by local law, they would not be determined by the law of Tennessee.

Dickinson v. Edwards, 77 N. Y. 573.

Texas was the principal place of performance.

As to the law of Texas we have no information. It will therefore be assumed, with reference to a question of this sort, that it is in accord with the law of New York.

Leavenworth v. Brockway, 2 Hill, 202, note; First Nat. Bank of Meadville v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 77 N. Y. 320.

The question involved is one of general commercial law, and the courts of this State will not in such a case defer to the views prevailing in other jurisdictions, in opposition to principles here established.

Mr. A. Walker Otis, for respondent:

The contract was made in Tennessee, and was to be performed in Tennessee. It was a Tennessee contract to be governed by Tennessee law.

The duties of an agent who is made such for the purpose of collecting a claim and remitting the proceeds are to collect, and in the exercise of ordinary care intrust the proceeds to some proper carrier for transmission to his principal. That done, his whole duty is accomplished, and the contract is performed.

Buell v. Chapin, 99 Mass. 594; Gurney v. Howe, 9 Gray, 404; Crane v. Pratt, 12 Gray, 348; Kingston v. Kincaid, 1 Wash. Terr. 357; Mechanics Bank of Baltimore v. Merchants Bank of Boston, 6 Met. 26; Indig v. National City Bank, 80 N. Y. 100.

Referring to the law of Tennessee, which exempts the defendant from responsibility in this case, it may be remarked that the courts of a majority of the States are on that side of the question. The following are the States which so hold: Massachusetts, Connecticut, Maryland, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Mississippi, Missouri, Tennessee, Pennsylvania and Louisiana,—eleven in all.

On the other side we have New York, New Jersey and Ohio.

Morse, Banks & Banking, §§ 265, 287; Mechan. Ag. ed. 1839, § 515.

Plaintiff by volunteering to do business with the Memphis Bank, by implication, consented to do so, subject to the rules under which it did business and subject to the laws of Tennessee, by which it was exempted from liability for the defaults of sub-agents.

Bank, 47 N. Y. 570; Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The rule has long been established in this State that a bank receiving commercial paper for collection, in the absence of a special agreement, is liable for a loss occasioned by the default of its correspondents or other agents selected by it to effect the collection. Allen v. Merchants Bank, 23 Wend. 215; Montgomery County Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459; Commercial Bank of Pa. v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 203; Agrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y. 570; Naser v. First Nat. Bank, 116 N. Y. 498. And the same rule prevails in some of the other States, in the United States Supreme Court, and in England. Titus v. Mechanics Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. L. 588; Wingate v. Mechanics Bank, 10 Pa. 104; Reeves v. Ohio State Bank, 8 Ohio St. 465; Tyson v. State Bank, 6 Blackf. 225; Simpson v. Waldbly, 63 Mich. 439, 6 West. Rep. 158; Mackersy v. Ramsays, 9 Clark & F. 818.

In such a case the collecting bank assumes the obligation to collect and pay over or remit the money due upon the paper, and the agents it employs to effect the collection, whether they be in its own banking-house or at some distant place, are its agents, and in no sense the agents of the owner of the paper. Because they are its agents, it is responsible for their misconduct, neglect, or other default. Here, when this money was received by Adams & Leonard, the defendant's agents, it was, in law, received by it, and it became absolutely bound to pay or remit the same to the plaintiff. It is difficult to see upon what principle the defendant could be held liable if Adams & Leonard, its agents, had carelessly failed to collect the draft, or had collected it, and then purposely misappropriated the proceeds thereof, and yet not liable for their failure to pay over the proceeds in consequence of their unexplained insolvency. Upon what principle can the defendant be held liable for one default of its agents, and not for every default? That the insolvency of the sub-agent in such a case does not shield the collecting agent from responsibility for the loss has been decided in several cases quite analogous to this. Reeves v. Ohio State Bank, Simpson v. Waldbly and Mackersy v. Ramsays, supra; and Bradstreet v. Everson, 72 Pa. 124. It is not needful now to vindicate the principle upon which these cases rest, as that has been sufficiently done by learned judges writing the opinions therein. They are well supported by many analogous cases in other branches of the law, and it is believed they lay down the best and safest rule, and subserve the wisest commercial policy. The case of Indig v. National City Bank, 80 N. Y. 100, is not opposed to these views. There the defendant received a note for collection which was payable at the Bank of Lowville, and it sent the note directly to the bank for payment, which on the next day sent a draft for the amount of the note to the defendant, and failed before the draft reached its destination, and it was held that the loss did not fall upon the defendant. That conclusion was reached by holding that the Lowville Bank was not the agent of the defendant, but that the defendant was in the same position as if it had sent the note to some agent, and he had received the proceeds thereof, and had then bought a draft on New York of the Lowville Bank for the amount, and the Bank had then failed before the draft was paid. The defendant there would have been held liable if the Lowville Bank had been its agent for the collection of the note. Briggs v. Central Nat. Bank, 89 N. Y. 182. After Adams & Leonard had received payment of the draft, they drew a draft upon Jemison & Co. for the amount, and sent that to the defendant for the purpose of discharging their obligation to the defendant. That draft was not made for the purpose of remitting the proceeds of the collection to the plaintiff, and was not used by the defendant for that purpose. It sent the draft to the First National Bank of New York for collection, intending afterwards to remit the proceeds of the collection to the plaintiff in some other way. After Adams & Leonard and Jemison & Co. had failed, it sent the worthless draft to the plaintiff. By so doing it did not discharge its obligations to the plaintiff. If Adams and Leonard had purchased a draft of the Dallas Bank, and sent that to the plaintiff, or if it had sent the draft to the defendant, and the latter had then sent it to the plaintiff, then, according to the doctrine of Indig v. National City Bank, the defendant would not have been responsible for the continued solvency of the Dallas Bank. That case was much discussed here, and there was much difference of opinion about it. It is a border case, and its doctrine should not be much extended.

The defendant, however, claims that the contract with the plaintiff is to be treated as a Tennessee contract, and that by the law of that State it cannot be made liable for this loss. Upon the trial, for the purpose of showing the law of that State, it put in evidence a decision of the supreme court in the case of Bank of Louisville v. First Nat. Bank of Knoxville, 8 Baxt. 101. In that case a bill of exchange, payable at the First National Bank of Knoxville, was sent by a New York Bank to the Bank of Louisville for collection. It was transmitted by the Louisville Bank to the Knoxville Bank, was received by the latter, and was subsequently returned unpaid. The cashier of the Knoxville Bank delivered the bill to a notary public in good repute at the time, who failed to protest it, by reason of which the right of action against the drawer was lost. The Louisville Bank paid the amount of the bill to the New York Bank, and then brought suit to recover against the Knoxville Bank, and failed. It was held that, "where a bank receives a bill of exchange for collection, payable at a distant place, its liability is discharged by transmitting the same, in due time, to a suitable and responsible bank or other agent, at the same place of payment; and in such case the principal's assent to the employment of a sub-agent is implied," and that, "if a debt be lost by negligence of an agent to whom a bill of exchange is sent for collection, the principal or home bank (having complied with its duty, and not being liable to the holders) cannot, by voluntarily discharging the claim of the payee, maintain an action on the case for negligence against the sub-agent. Such right accrues only to the holder or payee of the bill, under the circumstances." That decision was not based upon any statute law, but upon the principles of the common law, supposed to be applicable to the facts of the case. It did not make or establish law, but expounded the law, and furnished some evidence of what the law applicable to that case was,—evidence which other courts might or might not take and receive as reliable and sufficient; and even the same court, upon fuller discussion and more mature consideration, might, in some subsequent case, refuse to take the same view of the law. There is no common law peculiar to Tennessee. But the common law there is the same as that which prevails here and elsewhere, and the judicial expositions of the common law there do not bind the courts here. The courts of this State, and of other States, and of the United States would follow the courts of that State in the construction of its statute law. But the courts of this State will follow its own precedents in the expounding of the general common law applicable to commercial transactions, and so it has been repeatedly held. Faulkner v. Hart, 82 N. Y. 418; Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865; Oates v. First Nat. Bank of Montgomery, 100 U. S. 239, 25 L. ed. 580; Ray v. Western Pa. Gas. Co. 138 Pa. 576, 12 L. R. A. 290 (decided in Pennsylvania Supreme Court, Jan. 12, 1891). We must therefore hold that the obligation resting upon the defendant was that which the principles of the common law, as expressed by the courts of this State, placed upon it. If it be said that the contract between these parties was made in view of the common law, then we must hold that it was the common law as expounded here.

But it cannot be maintained that the contract between these parties was a Tennessee contract. It is by no means clear, even, that it can be held that the contract was made there. It does not certainly appear where it was made. It cannot be said that a new contract was made every time a piece of paper was sent by the plaintiff to the defendant for collection. There was a general contract between the parties, which was either created by some negotiation, or which grew out of the course of business between them, that the defendant should collect the paper sent to it for the compensation to be allowed. If that contract was made by correspondence, the plaintiff making a proposition by mail, and the defendant accepting it by mail, then, when the acceptance was put in the mail at Memphis, the contract was complete, and had its inception there. If the proposition came from the defendant, and was accepted in the same way in New York, then it would have to be treated as made in New York. In the absence of more proof than we have here, it cannot be assumed that this contract was made in Tennessee. Nor is this to be regarded as a Tennessee contract, for the reason that it was to be performed there, so that the defendant can claim that its obligations and interpretation are to be governed by Tennessee law. We cannot perceive how any substantial part of the contract was to be performed in Tennessee. The defendant was to collect this draft in Texas, and pay its proceeds, less its compensation, to the plaintiff in New York, and so the contract was to be performed in Texas and New York. Adams & Leonard collected the draft for the defendant in Texas, and sent it their own draft on Jemison & Co. This draft the defendant sent to the First National Bank of New York for collection and credit. If the draft had been paid, then the defendant would have had credit for the amount with that Bank, and would probably have sent its own draft on that Bank to the plaintiff for the amount of the collected draft, less its compensation, and that Bank would have paid that draft on presentation, and thus the proceeds of the collected draft would finally have reached the plaintiff, and the obligation of the defendant would then, and not until then, have been fully discharged. So, always, the defendant having collected a draft sent to it by the plaintiff, and received the proceeds thereof, would, in the ordinary course of business, discharge its obligation to the plaintiff by payment through its corresponding bank in New York. Therefore we think it is quite clear that this contract cannot, in any view, be treated as a Tennessee contract, subject in any way to the law of that State.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the order of the General Term should be reversed, and the judgment entered upon the verdict affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE D. BARNARD & CO., Appt.,

v.

KNOX COUNTY, Respnt.

(.....Mo.....)

A constitutional limitation on the amount of county indebtedness applies to a debt for necessary books and stationery which it is made by statute the duty of the county clerk to purchase for his office, as well as to any other obligation.

NOTE.—Constitutional inhibition against counties contracting debts. See note to Barnard v. Knox County (Mo.) 2 L. R. A. 428.

(June 29, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a county warrant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. M. Pollard for appellant.

Mr. William Clancy, with Mr. Charles D. Stewart, Pros. Attys., for respondent:

A Constitution is not to be made to mean one thing at one time and another at some subsequent time when the circumstances may have so changed as perhaps to make a different rule in the case seem desirable. What a court is to do is to declare the law as written, leaving it to the people themselves to make such changes as new circumstances may require.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 67, and cases cited.

A county cannot levy taxes to pay judgments against it, founded on warrants issued since the adoption of the present Constitution, to meet current expenses incurred since said adoption, where such levy is in excess of the rate prescribed for county purposes in art. 10, § 11, of said Constitution.

Arnold v. Hawkins, 14 West. Rep. 759, 95 Mo. 569; Black v. McGonigle, 108 Mo. 192.

This warrant was clearly issued for county current running expenses, and is clearly in violation of the Constitution.

Arnold v. Hawkins, supra.

Every person is presumed to know the law, and so knowing county officers and all those dealing with them are to contract and buy and sell within the prescribed limits of the law; and if any person so deals with the county and gets a county warrant, it is his duty to see that faithful county officers do not issue county warrants in excess of the revenues of that year. On any other theory of the law, the said sections 11 and 12 of article 10 of the Constitution of Missouri would be defeated and deprived of their clear and plain object and intention of making officers carry on the county governments within said maximum running annual expenses; but this court says the said Constitution is self-enforcing.

State v. Van Every, 75 Mo. 537; St. Joseph Board of Pub. Schools v. Patten, 62 Mo. 444, 450.

Black, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit upon a duly protested warrant issued by the County Court of Knox County to George D. Barnard, dated the 7th day of May, 1885, for $83.90, payable "out of any money in the treasury appropriated for contingent fund." Barnard assigned the warrant to the plaintiff corporation. The defense is that the debt for which the warrant was issued was created after the county court had issued warrants in excess of the revenue for 1885. In anticipation of this defense, it is alleged in the petition that though the county court had issued warrants in excess of the total revenue for that year, still the plaintiff's debt was created by law, and not by the act of the county court, and that the county debts for that year created by law were less than the county revenue for the same year. The case was tried on the following agreed facts: "That on the 7th day of May, 1885, the clerk of the County Court of Knox County, Missouri, bought from Geo. D. Barnard certain books and stationery for $83.90. That said books and stationery were suitable and necessary for the use of said clerk in his said official capacity. That thereupon said Barnard presented said bill for said books and stationery to the county court of said county, which said court audited and allowed said bill, and issued the warrant filed herein. . . . That there is no money in defendant's treasury now to pay the same. That at the time of issuing said warrant the said county court had issued warrants in excess of the total revenue of said county, for the year 1885, raised by a levy of 50 cents on the $100 and from licenses and other sources; but excluding the warrants issued during said year for support of paupers, and roads, and bridges, the remainder did not exceed such 50 cents on the $100.

That no vote of the people of the county on the question of paying this warrant, or the creation of the debt evidenced thereby, has ever been had. The annual revenue of the county, to the extent of the 50 cents on the $100 valuation, is now entirely consumed by the ordinary annual expenses of the county government." The provisions of the Constitution to be considered in the disposition of this case are found in sections 11 and 12 of article 10. The first provides: "For county purposes the annual rate on property, in counties having six million dollars or less, shall not, in the aggregate, exceed fifty cents on the one hundred dollars valuation." The same section fixes the maximum annual rate of taxes for city and town purposes and for school purposes, and contains these exceptions: (1) the annual rate for school purposes may be increased to a designated amount by a majority vote of the taxpayers; (2) the rate may be increased by a two-thirds vote for the purpose of erecting public buildings. The rate allowed to each county is to be ascertained by the amount of taxable property therein, according to the last assessment. "Said restrictions as to rates shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special, except taxes to pay valid indebtedness now existing, or bonds which may be issued in renewal of such indebtedness." Section 12 declares: "No county . . . shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner, or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose; nor in cases requiring such assent shall any indebtedness be allowed to be incurred to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate, exceeding five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein," etc. The Statute makes it the duty of the county court, at its May term in each year, to divide the revenue collected, and to be collected, into five designated and described funds, one of which is a contingent fund, not to exceed one fifth of the total revenue of the county for county purposes for any one year; and each fund is declared to be a sacred fund for the purpose for which it is designated. Sections 6818, 6819, Rev. Stat. 1879.

In 1875, and prior thereto, many of the counties and cities in this State were burdened with debts because of bonds issued in aid of railroads, some of which were never built, and on account of extravagance, frauds and defalcations of officials. To put an end to this state of affairs, the Constitution adopted in that year denied to any county or city the right to thereafter take stock in or loan its credit to any railroad company or other corporation, and, by the two sections before mentioned, sought to bring the administration of county affairs to a cash basis. As said in Book v. Earl, 87 Mo. 246, the evident purpose of the framers of the Constitution, and the people in adopting it, was to abolish, in the administration of county and municipal government, the credit system, and establish the cash system, by limiting the amount of tax which might be imposed by a county for county purposes, and by limiting the expenditures in any given year to the amount of revenue which such tax would bring into the treasury. We do not understand counsel for the appellant to dispute these propositions; but the claim is made, and pressed with much vigor, that section 12 does not include debts like that for which the warrant in question was given. The line of argument is this: As the Statute makes it the duty of the county clerk to provide suitable books and stationery for his office (§ 623, Rev. Stat. 1879), a debt created for such a purpose is not one incurred or created by the county court, but is a debt created by law, and such debts are not within the prohibition. Authorities are cited which give support to such a distinction: Grant County v. Lake County, 17 Or. 453; Barnard v. Knox County, 87 Fed. Rep. 568, 2 L. R. A. 426, and Rollins v. Lake County, 34 Fed. Rep. 845. The case last cited, it may be observed, was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. 130 U. S. 662, 32 L. ed. 1060.

On the other hand, the Constitution of Colorado contains this provision: "And the aggregate amount of indebtedness of any county for all purposes, exclusive of debts contracted before the adoption of this Constitution, shall not at any time exceed twice the amount above limited, unless," etc. The supreme court of that State said, when speaking of this clause: "The limitation being applicable to all debts, irrespective of their form, it follows that, in determining the amount of county indebtedness, county warrants are to be taken into account, and any warrant which increases the indebtedness over and beyond the limit fixed is in violation of the constitutional provision, and void." People v. May, 9 Colo. 80-98. The Circuit Court of the United States, in Rollins v. Lake County, supra, when having under consideration the clause of the Colorado Constitution before quoted, held that warrants issued for fees of witnesses, jurors, constables, and sheriff were not within the prohibition, because issued in payment of compulsory obligations; and hence it was no defense, in an action upon such warrants, that at the time they were issued the limit fixed by the Constitution had been reached. The Supreme Court of the United States, when speaking upon this question in the same case, said: "Neither can we assent to the proposition of the court below that there is, as to this case, a difference between indebtedness incurred by contracts of the county and that form of debt denominated 'compulsory obligations.' The compulsion was imposed by the Legislature of the State, even if it can be said correctly that the compulsion was to incur debt; and the Legislature could no more impose it than the county could voluntarily assume it, as against the disability of a constitutional prohibition. Nor does the fact that the Constitution provided for certain county officers, and authorized the Legislature to fix their compensation and that of other officials, affect the question.

In short, we conclude that article six, aforesaid, is a limitation upon the power of the county to contract any and all indebtedness, including all such as that sued upon in this action; and therefore, under the stipulation already set forth, the county is entitled to judgment." Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 32 L. ed. 1060. A clause in the Constitution of Illinois declares that "no county, city," etc., "shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose" beyond a stated amount. Yet the decisions of the supreme court of that State recognize no such distinction as that sought to be made in the case at bar. The result of the decisions of that court is that it can make no difference whether the debts be created for necessary current expenses or for something else. Prince v. Quincy, 105 Ill. 188, 215. The Supreme Court of Iowa, when speaking of the same clause in the Constitution of that State, says: "The language of this provision is very general and comprehensive. It includes indebtedness incurred in any manner, or for any purpose." Council Bluffs v. Stewart, 51 Iowa, 385. It is true, the clauses in the Constitutions of the States just named prohibit the incurring of indebtedness beyond a specified per cent of the assessed value of the taxable property, while in our Constitution the prohibition is against the incurring of an indebtedness in excess of the revenue of the particular year; but we do not see that this difference affects the question in hand. The object of all these provisions is to fix a limit to county and municipal indebtedness.

Our Constitution, it will be seen, first limits the rate of taxation for county purposes to 50 cents on the $100 valuation in counties like the one in question. This rate may be increased, by the assent of the qualified voters, for the purpose of erecting public buildings, but it cannot be increased, even by such assent, for any other purpose. We have held that a county court cannot levy a tax in excess of the 50 cents for any purpose, except for the purpose of erecting public buildings, and for the purpose of paying indebtedness existing at the date of the adoption of the Constitution. Arnold v. Hawkins, 95 Mo. 569, 14 West. Rep. 759; Black v. McGonigle, 103 Mo. 192. The maximum limit of the rate of taxation for county purposes being thus fixed, section 12, to repeat, declares: "No county, city, shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner, or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year." As to counties the only exception is that, with the assent of the voters, the expenditures may be increased for the erection of a court-house or jail. The language just quoted is clear and explicit, and construes itself. It is broad and comprehensive as to the character of the indebtedness. It includes indebtedness created in any manner, or for any purpose. This strong and comprehensive language admits of no distinction between debts created by a county court and debts created by law. In a sense, all county debts are created by law; for the counties possess those powers, and those only, which are conferred upon them by the Constitution and laws of the State. While it is the duty of the county court to care for paupers and insane persons, and to build bridges and repair roads, still the county court is governed by the Statute in the performance of these duties. Debts incurred for such purposes may be called debts created by law, as well as debts incurred by the county clerk for books and stationery. Nor does it make any difference that the debt in question was created by the clerk instead of the county court. The clerk, in the purchase of the books and stationery, acted as a county officer. The debt incurred by him, if he did not exceed its authority, is just as much a county debt as one incurred by the county court. The law confers upon various county officers the power to create debts for designated purposes, but the debts are all county debts when chargeable to the county. The county clerk, county court, and other county officers must take notice of these constitutional limitations, and exercise the powers conferred upon them in subordination to such restrictions. To hold otherwise is to say the clerk and other officers may execute statutory powers in excess of constitutional restrictions, and thus make the statute laws override the Constitution. It is, of course, a hardship to the plaintiff to declare this warrant worthless, but we cannot dispose of the question on any such a surface view of the matter. The Constitution seeks to protect the citizen and taxpayer, and their rights are not to be overlooked. It is the duty of persons dealing with counties and county officials, as well as of county officials themselves, to take notice of the limit prescribed by the Constitution. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 134a.

Soliciting agents, contractors, and others who deal with county officials, must see to it that the limit of county indebtedness is not exceeded, and, if they fail to do this, they must suffer the consequences. Unless this is so, there is an end to all effort to bring about an economical and honest administration of county affairs. If this scheme of county finances, built up by the Constitution, is a mistake, or if it produces great hardships in some counties, the remedy is with the people, and not with the courts. "What a court has to do is to declare the law as written, leaving it to the people themselves to make such changes as new circumstances may require." Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 67.

The plaintiff insists that there is no substantial difference between this case and Potter v. Douglas County, 87 Mo. 240. In that case the plaintiff sued Douglas County for services performed by him as jailer of Greene County, in keeping, boarding, clothing, and taking to court prisoners. The indebtedness was incurred under section 6090, Rev. Stat. 1879. The agreed statement showed "that, at the time the fee-bill was presented to the county court, the revenue for said years was expended, and the same could not be paid without issuing warrants in excess of the income and revenue for said years." On this statement we held that plaintiff could recover. It is to be observed that the agreed statement in that case did not show that the revenues had been expended when the indebtedness was incurred. For aught that appears, there may have been revenues unexpended and set apart to the proper fund when the indebtedness was contracted. Our opinion, however, is not placed on any such ground. It is placed upon grounds which would include the case in hand, and which are inconsistent with what has been said on the present occasion. There is, of course, a difference between the facts in that case and the facts in the present one; but the Constitution takes no notice of such differences. That case is therefore overruled.

Now, the agreed statement in this case does not, in terms, say that the contingent fund set apart for 1885 had been exhausted when the books and stationery were purchased; but it does show that the warrant was issued at the date of the purchase, and that at that time the county court had issued warrants in excess of the total revenue for that year. This statement must be taken in connection with the petition, which is framed upon the theory that the whole of the revenue had been consumed, unless warrants issued for the support of paupers and for building bridges and repairing roads are to be excluded. We think it sufficiently appears that the contingent fund had been consumed when the debt sued for was incurred. Indeed, this proposition is not questioned in the briefs. The warrant was issued in violation of the Constitution, and is void.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK & NEW ENGLAND R.
CO.

(.....Mass.....)

A railroad company owes a boy who is a mere trespasser on its land no duty to keep its turn-table in safe condition; and no inducement or invitation to him to go upon the premises can be implied from the fact that the situation and condition of the turn-table were such as to be likely to attract or allure a boy of his age.

(September 8, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Mason, Ch. J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in the direction of a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Everett W. Burdett and Charles A. Snow for plaintiff.

Messrs. Charles A. Prince and R. D. Weston-Smith for defendant.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff does not contend that he had any express invitation from the defendant to enter upon its premises, but that he was enticed or allured by the attractiveness of the turn-table; and the proposition of law upon which he relies is that if a railroad company leaves a turn-table unlocked or unguarded upon its own premises, near a public highway, or in an open or exposed position near the accustomed or probable place of resort of children, it is for the jury to determine, even in the absence of other evidence as to the attractive nature of the turn-table, whether it is, in and of itself, calculated to attract children, and whether a child injured upon it was in fact attracted or allured by it; that, if so allured or attracted, the child comes upon the premises of the railroad company through its implied invitation or inducement, and is not a bare licensee or trespasser; and that the company owes to such child the duty to refrain from ordinary negligence with respect to the condition and management of its turn-table.

The turn-table is stated in the exceptions to have been five or six hundred feet from a highway crossing the railroad, and six hundred feet from another highway crossing. Shortly before the accident, the plaintiff and some other boys were at a station on the railroad, which appears by a plan used at the trial to have been about one thousand feet from the turn-table; that they then asked some train-men who were switching cars on the tracks adjacent to the turn-table to let them ride on the cars, and, on being refused, went to the turn-table. The only thing stated in the exceptions to show that the turntable was attractive is that it had large upright standards or guys, twelve to fifteen feet in height, which could be seen from a considerable distance.

The cases upon which the plaintiff relies may be divided into two classes. Those of the first class rest upon the proposition that if a turn-table is of a dangerous nature and character, when unlocked or unguarded, in a place much resorted to by the public, and where children are wont to go and play, it is the duty of the railroad company owning the turn-table to keep the same securely locked or fastened, so as to prevent it from being turned or played with by children, or to keep the same guarded. Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 2 Dill. 294; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 31 L. ed. 745.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was apparently approved of in Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Bailey, 11 Neb. 332, and followed in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Simpson, 60 Tex. 103, in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Styron, 66 Tex. 421, in Ecan-sich v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 57 Tex. 123, and in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McWhirter, 77 Tex. 356. See also Bridger v. Asheville & S. R. Co. 25 S. C. 24; Ferguson v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 75 Ga. 637, 77 Ga. 102.

The second class of cases proceeds upon the doctrine of constructive invitation; that is that if a person is allured or tempted by some act of a railroad company to enter upon its land, he is not a trespasser. And it is held that leaving a turn-table unguarded is such an act. Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207; O'Malley v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 43 Minn. 289; Kansas Cent. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686; Nagel v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 75 Mo. 653.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout rests upon the proposition stated by Mr. Justice Hunt, "that while a railway company is not bound to the same degree of care in regard to mere strangers who are unlawfully upon its premises that it owes to passengers conveyed by it, it is not exempt from responsibility to such strangers for injuries arising from its negligence or from its tortious acts." The cases cited in support of this proposition are Lynch v. Murdin, 1 Q. B. 29; Birge v. Gardiner, 19 Conn. 507; Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 26 Conn. 591; Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628.

With the exception of Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co., all of these cases come within other rules or within well-defined exceptions to the general rule that a landowner owes no duty to a trespasser except he must not wantonly or intentionally injure him or expose him to injury.

Lynch v. Murdin, supra, rests upon the doctrine that if a person unlawfully places an obstruction in a way, he is liable to a child who is injured thereby, although the child wrongfully meddles with the obstruction. The contrary, however, was held in Hughes v. Macfie, 2 Hurlst. & C. 744, and in Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239. In Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 186, the plaintiff was found to be without fault, 13 L. R. A.

and not a trespasser. See also Clark v. Chambers, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 327; Powell v. Deveney, 3 Cush. 300.

Birge v. Gardiner, supra, rests upon the doctrine that an owner of land has no right to use his land near a highway in such a manner as to make it a public nuisance. To the same effect is Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332.

Bird v. Holbrook, supra, decides that a landowner cannot lawfully, without giving notice, set traps upon his own land for the purpose of injuring trespassers; and that, if a person is injured by such a trap, he may recover. And in Connecticut the rule is held to be the same though no notice is given. Johnson v. Patterson, 14 Conn. 1. This, as pointed out by Morton, J., in Marble v. Ross, 124 Mass. 44, 49, proceeds upon the ground that the owner of land cannot wantonly injure a trespasser. The case of a trespasser injured by a vicious animal stands upon the same footing. Marble v. Ross, supra.

The owner of land adjoining a public street is undoubtedly liable for an excavation made by him therein, if the land, with his consent, has for a long time been used by the public as a street. Larue v. Farren Hotel Co. 116 Mass. 67; Beck v. Carter, 68 N. Y. 283.

The case of Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co., supra, so far as it tends to support the result reached in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra, must be considered as overruled by Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 53 Conn. 461.

The Court of Appeals of New York has stated in a well-considered case that it does not uphold the decision in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra, and although it seeks to distinguish that case from the one before it, the difference between the two cases is not very apparent. McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126. In this case the plaintiff's intestate, a boy in his tenth year, stepped out of a window of the house in which he lived upon the platform of a fire-escape and fell through a trap door therein, which was insecurely fastened. The defendant was the landlord of the house and it was his duty to keep the fire-escape in order. It was held that he owed no duty to one who was using the fire-escape for his own pleasure; and that the defendant was not liable.

In Frost v. Eastern R. Co., 64 N. H. 220, 4 New Eng. Rep. 527, the plaintiff, a boy seven years of age, was injured while playing upon a turn-table of the defendant's railroad. The ground upon which he sought to recover was that he was attracted to the turn-table by the noise of boys playing upon it. The turn-table was on the defendant's land about sixty feet from a public street, in a cut with high, steep embankments on each side, and was insecurely fastened. It was held that the plaintiff was but a trespasser; and that, under the circumstances, the defendant owed him no duty. The court expressly refused to follow the case of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra.

On the question whether the defendant was liable on the ground of an implied invitation, Clark, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "One having in his possession agricultural or mechanical tools is not responsible for injuries caused to trespassers by careless handling, nor is the owner of a fruit tree bound to cut it down or inclose it, or exercise care in securing the staple and lock with which his ladder is fastened, for the protection of trespassing boys, who may be attracted by the fruit. Neither is the owner or occupant of premises upon which there is a natural or artificial pond, or a blueberry pasture, legally required to exercise care in securing his gates and bars to guard against accidents to straying and trespassing children. The owner is under no duty to a mere trespasser to keep his premises safe; and the fact that the trespasser is an infant cannot have the effect to raise a duty where none otherwise exists."

Subject to the exceptions we have before stated, and to some others which it is not necessary more particularly to refer to, an owner of land may use his land in such manner as he sees fit; and if a trespasser or mere licensee is injured he cannot complain that, if the owner had used it in a more careful manner, no injury would have resulted. Hounsell v. Smyth, 7 C. B. N. S. 731, and cases cited. Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 576; Klitx v. Nieman, 68 Wis. 271; Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74; Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 95 Pa. 398; Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144; Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1. See also Sheeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368; Metcalfe v. Cunard Steamship Co. 147 Mass. 66, 6 New Eng. Rep. 309, and cases cited; Barstow v. Old Colony R. Co. 143 Mass. 525, 8 New Eng. Rep. 746.

In Johnson v. Boston & M. R. Co., 125 Mass. 75, the plaintiff bought a ticket of the defendant corporation, which entitled her to be carried from Boston to Lawrence. She went as far as Somerville, a way station, and there left the cars and went to a house near by, intending to take a later train for Lawrence. After remaining at the house for awhile, she returned to the station, and, while crossing the tracks to the station of another railroad corporation to meet her son, was injured. The space between the two stations was partly planked and partly filled in with earth so as to form a convenient passageway; and evidence was offered that a large number of passengers were in the habit of using this space as the plaintiff was using it; and that no notice or warning to the contrary had been posted. It was held that the evidence failed to show that the defendant held out any inducement to the plaintiff to enter its premises; that the use of the premises as a passageway by strangers was a matter in which the defendant was absolutely passive, and from which nothing was to be inferred in favor of or in aid of the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff was a mere intruder, and could not recover. See also Wright v. Boston & M. R. Co. 129 Mass. 440.

In Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co., 126 Mass. 377, a child, four years of age, was run over by the cars of a railroad corporation while using the track as a playground. There was a footpath across the tracks which was used by persons, but in which the plaintiff had no rights, and by which he got upon the track. Evidence was offered that the defendant had been notified that the place was dangerous for children, and had been requested to place a fence across the path. The court held that the plaintiff was a mere trespasser upon the track; that no inducement or implied invitation had been held out to him; and that he could not recover. There was some evidence in this case that the engineer acted maliciously, or with gross and willful carelessness; and this question was submitted to the jury, who found for the defendant.

In Wright v. Boston & A. R. Co., 142 Mass. 296, 2 New Eng. Rep. 725, there was a well-defined path leading to a railroad track, and an opening in a ridge near the track, and a passageway for the path through the ridge. There was no fence or obstruction to prevent persons from going on the track from the path, and when freight cars stood on the track an opening opposite the path was sometimes left. This path had been used by persons to cross the track, and no objection had been made by the defendant's servants to persons crossing there, except when cars were approaching. The plaintiff, a boy between six and seven years of age, was injured while going to school and crossing the track by the path. It was held that these facts would not warrant the jury in finding that the defendant had held out an inducement or invitation to the plaintiff to use the path to cross the track.

The case of McEachern v. Boston & M. R. Co., 150 Mass. 515, came up on demurrer to the declaration, which alleged, in substance, that the defendant, a railroad corporation, left a car standing on one of several side tracks adjoining a public street; that the defendant knew that one of the doors of the car was insecurely fastened, and was liable upon receiving a slight touch to fall to the ground; that the defendant well knew that said car then was, and would be, an enticing, attractive, and inviting object to children; and well knowing that children there were, and long prior thereto had been, accustomed to play in, upon, around, and about such cars as might happen from time to time to be placed upon any of said side tracks; that the plaintiff, being then upwards of eleven years of age, was traveling upon the street in the vicinity of the side track upon which the car was standing, "and saw said car with its open door, and was thereby enticed and invited to look into said car, and thereupon did undertake to look into said car exercising therein as much care as could reasonably be expected of a child of his years and capacity; and that in attempting to look into said car he carefully touched said door, and immediately said door fell upon him," and injured him. The demurrer was sustained, on the ground that the plaintiff was a trespasser, committing an unlawful act in meddling with the defendant's car; that he was not invited or enticed there by the defendant; and that the defendant owed him no duty to have the car safe for him to visit.

In McCarty v. Fitchburg R. Co., 153 Mass.

—, a child about five years old strayed from the yard of the house in which it lived onto a street, and thence into the freight yard of a railroad corporation, where it was injured. The freight yard was parallel with the street and there was no fence between. It was held, in the absence of evidence that a fence was required by Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 115, that it did not appear that there was any evidence of a breach of any duty which the defendant owed the plaintiff.

The cases which we have last cited are conclusive of the one at bar, whatever may be the rule elsewhere. The plaintiff was a mere trespasser upon the land of the defendant. We find no evidence of any invitation by the defendant or inducement held out to him to go there, and no evidence of a breach of any duty which it owed him. The superior court rightly directed a verdict for the defendant.

Exceptions overruled.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL, by Information,

v.

George C. ABBOTT.

(.....Mass.....)

1. An intention to dedicate land for parks is shown where a corporation formed for establishing a summer resort procures land and records plats thereof with open spaces left thereon marked "park," copies of which are, for the purpose of selling lots, hung in public places and distributed about the country as circulars, and assurances are freely given by those having charge of the sale that the parks shall always be kept open.

2. One holding a bond for one half the share in the proceeds of sales to which a stockholder in a corporation formed for establishing a summer resort will be entitled, has no such interest as to give him a voice in determining the policy of the company or to make his assent to, or dissent from, its proposed plans material.

3. Four of the six directors who own in equal shares all the stock of a corporation formed for establishing a summer resort upon its land may make a binding dedication of portions of such land to the public for parks.

4. The facts that very little has been done to adorn land claimed to have been dedicated by the originator of a summer resort for park purposes, and that that little was done by the originator himself, who exercised some control over the land, are not of much weight to show absence of intention to dedicate.

5. The acceptance of a dedication of land for park purposes need not, at common law, be by the town, nor need it be very specific. Acts by the public at large showing an acceptance are sufficient to devote the owner of the easement.

6. Purchasers of real estate are bound by a prior dedication thereof to the public.

7. One who before purchasing land makes a laborious investigation of facts tending to show its dedication to public use will not, in case it proves to have been so dedicated, be protected as a purchaser without notice, although he came to the conclusion upon either the law or the facts that it had not been dedicated.

(September 3, 1891.)

NOTE.—Dedication of lands for public parks.

The vital principle of a common-law dedication for public use is the intention, which must be unequivocally manifested, and clearly and satisfactorily appear (White Bear v. Stewart, 40 Minn. 284); but this intention may also be gathered from the owners' acts and conduct in respect to the property. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70; Phillips v. Day, 82 Cal. 80.

An owner of land who lays off a town or village thereon, and sells lots with reference to a map showing the town site to be divided into streets, etc., and upon which public squares or plazas are represented, thereby makes an irrevocable dedication of the spaces represented as streets, squares, etc., to the use of the public. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170.

Where certain owners of a tract of land laid the same off into blocks and lots, as an addition to the City of St. Louis, and the same was platted and recorded, and there was written upon the plat the words, "The land marked 'A' (describing it), is to be and remain a common forever," and known on the record as "Exchange Square" it is a dedication by the proprietor; of this parcel of property to public use for a common. For all other purposes, then, it remains the property of the owners. The word "common" is used by the dedicators in its popular signification, as a parcel of land set apart for common and public use. Cummings v. St. Louis, 7 West. Rep. 274, 90 Mo. 250.

It is beyond the power of the Legislature to authorize any other use of property dedicated by private owners than that specified in the act of dedication; nor can it extend or enlarge the uses, much less authorize an out-and-out sale of property. Ibid. 13 L. R. A.

The difference between a statutory and common-law dedication is that one vests the legal title to the ground set apart for public purposes in a municipal corporation, in trust for the public; while the other leaves the legal title in the original owner, charged with the same rights and interests in the public which it would have if the fee was in the corporation. Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 5 West. Rep. 529, 118 Ill. 61.

An acceptance will be presumed if the gift is beneficial; and user is evidence that it is beneficial. Abbott v. Cottage City, 3 New Eng. Rep. 773, 143 Mass. 521.

It will not be contended that any formal acceptance on the part of the public is necessary, or even practicable. When a proprietor lays off a town, makes and publishes a plat of it, showing the blocks, lots, streets and public squares, and sells to various parties blocks and lots, referring to such plat in describing them, the acceptance will be implied. The proprietor in such case deals with the public. In every sale of a lot or block under such circumstances he gives an assurance that the ground, as platted, shall remain intact. Carter v. Portland, 4 Or. 389; Ang. & D. Highways, 8d ed. § 149.

The sale of lands by the owner according to a map showing a street 150 feet in width, and the user of 80 feet in width of such street by the public for years, constitutes a complete dedication and acceptance which cannot be affected by a deed from a subsequent owner. Logan v. Rose, 88 Cal. 263.

The owner of lands may devote and dedicate them to public use, and it is now well-settled law that a dedication of lands to public use does not require the existence of a corporation in which to vest the title. Such a dedication will be valid, with-

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Bristol County (Field, J.), for the opinion of the full court of a proceeding instituted to enjoin defendant from interfering with the right of the public to use and enjoy certain parks in the Town of Cottage City. Decree for plaintiff.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Thomas M. Stetson and Hosea M. Knowlton for plaintiff.

A part of tenants in common cannot make a dedication. It requires all.

The four associates by their most solemn act placed on record, viz., their deed, have not only said the property was free and clear, but have warranted it to be so, and ought now to be estopped and held incompetent to testify that this solemn act of theirs was false.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 22.

Mr. Abbott is a bona fide purchaser for value, and without notice. A purchaser has a right to rely upon such evidence as the registry of deeds affords, and if there is no recorded deed, to assume that the record title is the true title.

Dow v. Whitney, 6 New Eng. Rep. 276, 147 Mass. 6; Atty-Gen. v. Merrimack Mfg. Co. 14 Gray, 601; Colorado C. & I. Co. v. United States, 123 U. S. 807, 31 L. ed. 182.

Neither recording plans with the word "park" upon them nor circulating such plans amounts to a dedication on the part of the owner.

Com. v. Fisk, 8 Met. 258; Atty-Gen. v. Merrimack Mfg. Co. supra; Light v. Goddard, 11 Allen, 5; Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston, 127 Mass. 874; Coolidge v. Dexter, 129 Mass. 167; Williams v. Boston W. P. Co. 184 Mass. 406; Regan v. Boston Gas Light Co. 137 Mass. 87; Atty-Gen. v. Whitney, 187 Mass. 450.

There is no suggestion in any deed in the case at bar that any plan is referred to as exhibiting any squares, parks, public parks or public areas. The purposes for which the plans are referred to are defined (to ascertain easily the location of the land conveyed and its dimensions and boundaries); and unless these specified objects are necessarily dependent upon, or to be construed with other portions of the plan, such other portions are not brought within the scope of the conveyances.

Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston, Light v. Goddard, and Atty-Gen. v. Whitney, supra.

To constitute dedication there must be some unequivocal act of the owner uniting with the intent to divest himself of the control of the property, and to vest an irrevocable interest in some other body.

Atty-Gen. v. Merrimack Mfg. Co. 14 Gray, 604; Atty-Gen. v. Lord Foley, 1 Dick. 363.

The acts shown by plaintiff in this case are, at the best, of the most equivocal kind, and show a most decided intention on the part of the owners not to divest themselves of title and not to vest an irrevocable interest in any body.

See Beatty v. Kurtz, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 566, 7 L. ed. 521; Atty-Gen. v. Merrimack Mfg. Co. supra.

There can be no such thing as a dedication to the lotowners. Whatever rights they have they have by grant, and if they have any rights by reference to plans or by representations or out any specific grantee in existence at the time the dedication is made. The public is an ever existing grantee, capable of taking a dedication for public uses. Rutherford v. Taylor, 83 Mo. 817; M. E. Church Trustees v. Hoboken, 33 N. J. L. 16.

A person who, for seven years after obtaining his majority, has knowledge of the action of a village in opening and improving a street partly his property, and permits it to be used without objection, may be presumed to have made a dedication of so much of the land as is within the street. McKey v. Hyde Park, 37 Fed. Rep. 389.

Where the owner of land lays it off into blocks, lots, and streets, platting it as an addition to a city, and causes the plat, although not acknowledged so as to entitle it to record, to be recorded in the book of deeds in the office of the clerk of the county in which the land is situated, and sells and conveys any of the lots or blocks by a reference, in the description thereof, to such plat, it constitutes an irrevocable dedication to the public of the streets shown upon it. Meler v. Portland C. R. Co. 1 L. R. A. 866, 18 Or. 500.

One who has sold lots with reference to a certain named avenue, and has dedicated the avenue to the public, cannot afterwards revoke the dedication, after its acceptance, by conveying the strip covered by the avenue to another. Brown v. Stark, 83 Cal. 636.

To make such dedication complete, no formal acceptance by the town authorities is necessary. The owner of the land holds the title to the property dedicated in trust for the public. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170.

Where a strip of land has been dedicated and accepted as an avenue, and lots sold with reference thereto, the former owner cannot vary the nature of the strip by her own statement that she intended it only as a private alley. Brown v. Stark, supra.

A general dedication of land for public squares implies that they are to be enjoyed by the public at large, and they cannot rightfully be appropriated by city authorities for the use of the city in the management and conduct of its economic affairs. Church v. Portland, 6 L. R. A. 259, 18 Or. 73.

An owner of land around a public park, the fee of which is owned by the city, has no vested interest therein, such as will enable him to prevent the city, under sanction of the Legislature, from discontinuing the park and converting the land to other uses. Clarke v. Providence, 1 L. R. A. 725, 16 R. I. 337.

Where a parcel of ground in a city of the third class in Kansas is dedicated for a public park, the city, and not the board of county commissioners, is entitled to its control and possession. Hurd v. Harvey County, 40 Kan. 92.

Where a person has long enjoyed the use of land on a public square as appurtenant to his hotel, which right was granted to a former owner of the hotel lot, weighing scales cannot be erected thereon to his annoyance and injury, under an order of the trustees of the town granting the privilege of setting up such scales on condition that they should not interfere with the use of other private property. Gibson v. Black (Ky.) Sept. 20, 1888.

otherwise, they are the parties to enforce them, and not the Commonwealth.

Pool v. Huskinson, 11 Mees. & W. 827; Bermundsey v. Brown, L. R. 1 Eq. Cas. 215.

No public way can be established by dedication merely, and without the assent, express or implied, of the city or town bound by law to keep it in repair.

Bowers v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. 4 Cush. 840. See also Pool v. Huskinson, supra.

To constitute a dedication there must be an abandonment by the owner to the use of the public exclusively, and not a mere user by the public in connection with a user by the owners in such measure as they may desire.

Washb. Easem. p. 205

An acceptance is necessary.

Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 37.

In this case, the Town voted not to accept, or, what is the same thing, to indefinitely postpone the consideration of an offer. Express acceptance by the town and repairs made by its officers are admissible to prove acceptance.

Ree v. Chicago, 38 Ill. 322.

There was none in this case. Direct recognition by the proper authorities is required.

Hyde v. Jamaica, 27 Vt. 448; Tillman v. People, 12 Mich. 401; Jordan Trustees v. Otis, 37 Barb. 50.

The owner of the land must intend to make the gift, and it must be accepted by the public authorities.

Princeton v. Templeton, 71 Ill. 68; Hayden v. Stone, 112 Mass. 846; Derby v. Alling, 40 Conn. 410; Fairfield v. Morrey, 44 Vt. 289; Portland v. Whittle, 3 Or. 126.

It is necessary, in the very nature of things, that in order to constitute a dedication, there must be an acceptance by the city or town in which the land dedicated is located. Somebody that has a tangible existence must assume the responsibility or obligations which may from time to time attach in respect to that land.

Bowers v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. 4 Cush. 832, 840; Hayden v. Stone, 112 Mass. 846-851; Guild v. Shedd, 150 Mass. 255; Morse v. Stocker, 1 Allen, 154.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A perusal of the voluminous evidence, aided by the full briefs of counsel, shows to our satisfaction that there was an intention on the part of the owners of the parcels of land called Ocean Park, Hartford Park, and Waban Park, to dedicate them to the use of the public as parks, and that the same were used by the public enough to show an acceptance thereof, prior to the year 1880.

It will not be useful to state in much detail the evidence which leads to these results, or to discuss the particulars in which witnesses disagree or contradict each other. The general features, however, are as follows: In 1866, six persons united in a plan for making a place of summer resort at Oak Bluffs in Edgartown. One of them already owned a large lot of vacant land which was deemed suitable for the purpose. Each of the five others purchased an undivided sixth part thereof. A professional landscape gardener, Mr. Copeland, was employed to lay out the grounds in such a manner as would be likely to attract people who would come there only for the summer, and to induce them to buy lots, build cottages, and establish a village. In 1867, a deed of the premises was made to two of their number as trustees, for the benefit of the six owners: and in 1868 an Act of incorporation was obtained, and the land was conveyed to the corporation. The sole purpose of the corporation was the holding, improving and disposing of the land and a wharf then held by the two trustees, with power, also, to purchase, hold, improve and dispose of other adjacent lands. Stat. 1868, chap. 60. At the outset, the original six owners constituted all of the stockholders of the corporation, and they all became directors. According to the by-laws, four directors constituted a quorum, with full power to do all that the full board of directors could do; and the directors were to prepare the real estate of the company for sale, make sales thereof, expend all moneys, and dispose of all other property of the company in such manner as they should judge best calculated to promote the object of the company, and advance the interest of the stockholders, and make such improvements as they might deem advisable. Plans for laying out the proposed village were prepared by Mr. Copeland showing open spaces not divided into lots. These plans underwent certain changes in matters of detail. One plan, recorded August 20, 1867, showed such an open space, to which on later plans the name of "Ocean Park" was given, though with a change of limits. After this, and after the corporation was formed, other land was bought, and a new plan was made, which was recorded May 7, 1870, showing the three parks now in controversy described by their names. After this, there was no change in the boundaries of Hartford and Waban Parks, but there was a change in Ocean Park. A new plan was made, dated June 1, 1871, showing Ocean Park with somewhat modified boundaries, and the other parks as in the earlier plan, and this was recorded July 5, 1871. Still another plan was made in 1871, showing the three parks without change of limits, and this was recorded in 1873. A few lots were bargained for in 1867, but no sales were actually completed till 1868, after which lots were rapidly sold, to the number of five hundred within three years. Copies of the several plans were struck off, and widely circulated. The printed copies of the plan which was recorded August 20, 1867, had the name of "Ocean Park" added. Some of these were framed, and hung up in hotels, steamboats, railroad stations, and other public places. Very many were distributed through the mails. During all the period of settling the plans, great pains were taken to give wide publicity to them, not only in the above methods, but by circulars and advertisements calling attention to them, and by printing a reduced copy of one or more of them upon letter sheets. Copies of the plans were also kept in the directors' room for free distribution.

The testimony makes it very plain that the establishment of open spaces or parks was deemed an important feature of the scheme for selling lots. At the outset it was a matter of discussion among the parties interested. Lots fronting upon the parks or having an unobstructed view of them, were deemed more attractive. Assurances were freely given by those having charge of the sale of the lots that these spaces or parks should always be kept open. Four of the original owners testify in distinct terms that it was the intention of those interested in the enterprise to make them open parks, free to the public forever. This is so extremely natural and probable, and any other course would be so unlikely, that evidence of a contrary intention on the part of any one of them would be received with some distrust. If the corporation had announced at the time of making the sales that it reserved the right to cut up the open spaces into building lots to sell them, after the village should be established, it would no doubt have diminished the sales. If the corporation had an intention to reserve this right, the course pursued of inviting purchasers was inconsistent with common honesty.

The defendant concedes that some of the original owners and stockholders in the corporation gave such assurances to purchasers and in various ways gave wide publicity to the plan of having these places kept open as public parks; but he contended that two of them did not assent to this course. One of these, Mr. Darrow, died in 1871; the other was a witness in the case. As to both of these, the evidence is satisfactory to show that they assented to the plan in manner and form as it was put forth to the public. Mr. Darrow at the outset thought too much land was devoted to the parks, but after discussion, acquiesced in the opinion of the majority. The other one, while in his direct testimony he denied that he ever assented to the plan, or that there was ever any authority to bind the owners of the land or the corporation by a dedication of the parks to the public, yet admitted that he knew of the existence of the plans and of their being on record, that he had seen them at many places, and that he gave away some of them himself; probably some of each.

The defendant also suggests that one Worth was interested, and never assented to the dedication. Worth held a bond from Bradley for one half of Bradley's share of the proceeds of sales, but his title was not such as to give him a voice in the proceedings, or to make his assent or dissent material. He did not become a stockholder in the corporation till 1877.

Without dwelling upon various other particulars of the evidence, which tend in the same direction, we cannot doubt that it was a part of the scheme of the enterprise or speculation that the public should understand that these spaces should be left open for public use, and that no right was reserved to sell them for building lots; and that the corporation held out to the public this assurance, and at the time fully and fairly intended to give up this right; and that the two persons upon whose supposed dissent the defendant relies did not in fact dissent at the time. If they had done so, their dissent would be overborne by the action of the other four; but it seems to us more reasonable and probable to suppose that at the time they acquiesced, if they did not fully concur, in the views of the majority.

It is not necessary to go nicely into the question, at what time the intention to devote these open spaces to the public became fully formed. There certainly was an intention that some spaces should be left open, at an early day. Before the corporation was created a plan showing such spaces was prepared and put on record. Some changes were afterwards made in the boundaries. The land containing "Waban Park" was subsequently purchased.

The limits of these three several open spaces were finally settled after the corporation was formed. For a time, there was a somewhat fluctuating intention, so far as limits and boundaries were concerned. But the limits as shown on the last two plans may be taken as representing the final conclusion of the corporation as to the limits of the spaces that were to be left open.

The fact that not much was done to adorn these spaces, and that the corporation itself did whatever was done in this respect, and to some extent it seemed to exercise a certain control over the land, is not of much weight in opposition to the conclusion to which we have come. The chief element of a public park, in such a place, at least till the village is well settled, is to have the land kept open. The adornment would naturally come later if at all. The corporation did a little toward improving and caring for these open spaces. It had some interest in doing so. Ordinarily, when parks are established for public use, the municipal authorities exercise control over them. It was not so here. Whatever was done was done by the corporation, which to some extent did what municipal authorities usually do. Washb. Easem. *146, 147, 156. The corporation was interested in pushing its speculation, and as long as it had many lots left for sale it did something for the parks; but afterwards they were much neglected.

On the whole, we think the evidence is sufficient to show an offer to the public of the spaces shown on the last two plans, as Ocean, Hartford and Waban Parks.

In Atty-Gen. v. Whitney, 187 Mass. 450, where a majority of the court thought there was not sufficient evidence of such an intention, the evidence of dedication was far less strong.

The acceptance of such a dedication at common law need not appear of record, and need not be by the town. The acceptance is by the public at large, and the principal thing to show it is used by the public. Washb. Easem. *128, 139, 140. There is no need of a formal grantee. The fee remains in the original owner. Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452. No assent of the town is necessary, because no burden is put upon the town, as in the case of a way. The improvements upon a park thus dedicated are left to be made by those who are interested. The town may take it up, or it may be left to individuals. If in a seaside summer resort no improvements at all are made, there will still be some benefit from having a space left for air, and for an open unobstructed prospect. Whether the easement of a public park could be accepted merely by enjoying an unobstructed view over it of the ocean need not be considered. Various other acts of use of all the parks are shown, sufficient to show an acceptance of them by the public. Such acceptance need not be very specific.

The defendant contends that such acceptance must have been by the Town of Edgartown originally, or by the Town of Cottage City afterwards. The chief argument in support of this view is, that there must be somebody who can be held responsible for the abatement of a nuisance, if one should exist upon the property; and that if the dedication is not to the town, and accepted by the town, there is virtually no owner of the property. This argument is of force, but the technical answer is that the fee remains in the original owner. The dedication for a park carries only an easement. This easement is not in the town, but it is in the public at large. There may be inconveniences in this doctrine, in cases which are supposable and possible, but the doctrine itself has been widely adopted, and has been expressly recognized as in force in this Commonwealth. Abbot v. Cottage City, 143 Mass. 521, 8 New Eng. Rep. 773. We need not consider whether this mode of accepting a park has been done away with by Stat. 1882, chap. 154.

The defendant further contended that he was a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, and that his title should therefore be protected. This argument, however, cannot prevail, for two reasons. In the first place, purchasers of real estate must take notice of such a fact as a dedication to the public, in like manner as they must take notice of a title gained by adverse possession. There are various infirmities to which titles which appear good on the records are exposed. Gillespie v. Rogers, 146 Mass. 610, 6 New Eng. Rep. 297, and cases there cited. If a dedication has become complete, the original owner cannot afterwards resume control or convey the land free from the easement of the public, any more than if the easement had been gained by prescription. Washb. Easem. *139; Goddard, Easem. 181; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 662; M. E. Church Trustees v. Hoboken, 33 N. J. L. 13.

But, moreover, in the present case, the defendant was fully put upon inquiry as to the facts, and made a laborious investigation of them, but came to a conclusion either upon the law or upon the facts different from that which we have reached. Under such circumstances, it cannot be held that he was a purchaser without notice. The price which he paid was far less than the value of the land, provided the title was clear, and whatever may have been the defendant's opinion as to the validity of his title, he certainly had reason to know that it was liable to be questioned.

Decree for the plaintiff.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The title to great ponds passed under deeds from Plymouth Colony, which plainly intended to convey them although the intention appears only from the habendum clauses of the deeds, no mention of them being found in the granting clauses.
2. The fact that a town was incorporated two years after the Colonial Ordinance of 1647, declaring the public rights in great ponds, became law, with boundaries nearly coincident with those of a prior private land grant, will not cause the territory embraced thereby to be treated as town property in determining the application of the ordinance to ponds situated therein, where the town is not shown to have ever assumed proprietorship over the land or ponds, and they appear to have been always dealt with as private property.
3. The rights in a great pond which had been appropriated to private persons, and was held by them as private property at the time the Colony Ordinance of 1647, declaring the public rights in great ponds, became operative, were not affected by that ordinance.
4. Where a colony conveyed a portion of a great pond to private owners prior to the taking effect of the Ordinance of 1647, which declared the public rights in great ponds, neither it nor its subsequent grantee of the remaining portion could, as owner and apart from the exercise of sovereign powers, draw off the water of the pond to the detriment of the prior grantees.
5. Although the Ordinance of 1647, declaring the public rights in great ponds, became applicable in Plymouth Colony as part of the common law, the fiction that the common law has existed immemorially does not require its application to transactions which arose prior to the Province Charter which made such law applicable therein.
6. A corporation composed of representatives of the several mills owning water-power on a river, which has built and maintains a dam at the outlet of the reservoir, and controls the whole waterpower in the interest of the owners for their benefit, may sue to enjoin third persons from drawing water from the reservoir.

APPEALS by complainants from decrees of the Superior Court for Bristol County dismissing bills filed to enjoin defendant from drawing water from the Watuppa Ponds. Reversed.

NOTE.—This subject has received extended treatment in a note appended to Henry v. Newburyport (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 179. See also Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 1 L. R. A. 466, 147 Mass. 566; Proprietors of Mills v. Braintree Water Supply Co. 4 L. R. A. 272, 149 Mass. 478; Fernald v. Knox Wool Co. 7 L. R. A. 459, 82 Me. 42; Atty-Gen. v. Revere Copper Co. 9 L. R. A. 510, 152 Mass. 444.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. R. Hoar and Jennings & Brayton, for appellants:
The title to the Watuppa Ponds was in the Colony of Plymouth.

It owned the soil and the waters and had a right to convey the same.

If it imposed no conditions or restrictions in its deed, the grantee would hold upon the same conditions on which the State held it and no other.

The Pocasset deed conveys all ponds, waters, etc., in explicit terms. It is not a case of doubtful construction where the construction is to be in favor of the public.

See Holyoke W. P. Co. v. Lyman, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

It is to be construed as any private grant would be construed.

Boston v. Richardson, 18 Allen, 156, 157.

The grant is absolute and unlimited on its face. Unless controlled by some statute of the Colony limiting and restricting its operation, the riparian owners of the "mill lot" cannot be deprived of the natural flow of the stream without compensation. No legislation subsequent to the grant can divest them of any part of it.

A grant in Massachusetts Colony, prior to 1641, of a pond by a town, would have been valid.

A grant of land by a State is a contract governed by the laws in force when it is made, and is protected by the Constitution from impeachment by a subsequent law.

The fact that in the deed rivers, waters, etc., are not specifically named, makes no difference to the deed's legal effect in conveying all the water rights and privileges which by law appertained to the land bordering upon the stream.

The Ordinance of 1641-47 applied solely to ponds lying in common, which means ponds not previously conveyed or appropriated in whole or in part to any particular person or persons.

Tudor v. Cambridge Water Works, 1 Allen, 164.

Messrs. James F. Jackson and Edward Higginson, for appellee:

The Commonwealth is the absolute owner of great ponds, holding them as trustee for the public uses and enjoyment, by a title similar to that which it has in navigable rivers and tide waters, and no private rights of property exist in such ponds.

The reasoning is similar to that governing the consideration of public and private fishery rights.

The principle already applied to owners on the shore is applied to owners upon the outlet stream.

The Ordinance of 1647 is not only in force throughout the whole territory of this State, but its rule was established as the law of the Plymouth Colony.

Barker v. Bates, 13 Pick. 255; Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 1 L. R. A. 466, 147 Mass. 548, 556.

The principle of the Ordinance of 1647 was an active rule of law, applicable to the Watuppa Pond, in the years (1680, 1686) when the grants now relied upon by plaintiffs were made; and to avail plaintiffs it must be found that the grants "conveyed to them the title to the ponds or the waters thereof."

Ibid.

The grants must be construed with reference to the rules of law existing at the time they were given, including the rule found in the Ordinance of 1647.

Bishop, Cont. §§ 456, 480; Damman v. Commissioners of S. & U. Lands, 4 Wis. 414.

The terms of these grants are to be taken most strongly against the grantees and in favor of the grantor; and the grants will not be held to include the Watuppa Pond "unless it is included in its terms by express words or necessary implication."

Even if the word "ponds" were expressly mentioned in the granting clause, it should not be held to include great ponds held in trust for the public by the grantor.

If the terms of the grants are ambiguous as to the great ponds, evidence of contemporaneous and long-continued usage is admissible to ascertain the intent.

If any title in the pond passed to the Proprietors of Freetown or of Pocasset, it was the legal title only, the beneficial right remaining in the public. The Proprietors never attempted to convey to a private person. If they had so attempted it would have been "in violation of law and of no effect."

Atty-Gen. v. Revere Copper Co. 9 L. R. A. 510, 152 Mass. 444.

The grants must be construed with reference to the situation of the parties, the state of the country and of the thing granted.

Adams v. Frothingham, 3 Mass. 352; Com. v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 451, 498.

Bodies of proprietors bore a semi-political character, and although for certain purposes they have been held to possess some of the rights of ordinary tenants in common, yet, whether under the name of "proprietors," "freemen," or "townsmen," their organization largely partook of a public nature.

Com. v. Roxbury, supra; Angell & A. Corp. chap. 6; Order of Gen. Ct. of Plym. Rep. 12.

The Pocasset proprietors acted in the manner common to such bodies in both colonies, as to their meetings, orders, etc. Both Pocasset and the Freemen's purchase were incorporated as towns soon after the settlement. The former became Tiverton (1694) and the latter Freetown (1683). When the boundary disputes with Freetown (Rep. 10) were settled in 1700 the agreement was made between "the proprietors of Freetown" and "the proprietors of Tiverton." The line they agreed upon continued to be the division line between the two towns.

Fowler's Hist. Fall River, pp. 21, 62.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are the same cases which are reported in 147 Mass. 548. Since that decision other facts have been added to the agreed statement and the cases have been reargued with reference not only to the facts now first appearing but also to the old ones, and we have been asked to reconsider our former judgment. We intend, however, to express no opinion 18 L. R. A.

on the questions passed on then, because apart from the questions upon which our opinions were divided we are agreed that the plaintiffs now make a case calling for the interposition of this court.

The plaintiffs are successors in title to grantees of Plymouth Colony, to whom the land under and on both sides of the outlet of the pond, the Fall River, to a point below the plaintiff's dam, was conveyed as part of a large tract. This conveyance was made on March 5, 1680, to Church, Gray and others, and is known as the Pocasset grant or purchase. The territory described in the granting clause of the deed included the whole of the South Watuppa Pond and a large part, but less than half, of the North Watuppa Pond. The habendum is "all the above mentioned and bounded lands with all and singular the woods, waters, coves, creeks, ponds, brooks, benefits, profits, privileges, and hereditaments whatsoever in before arising, accruing, belonging or thereto anyways appertaining, or to any part or parcel thereof." The plaintiffs also own other land on the Fall River as successors in title to other grantees of Plymouth Colony, to whom another large tract was conveyed in 1656, including all of the North Watuppa Pond not embraced in the Pocasset grant. This is known as the Freemen's purchase.

The new questions concern the effect of these deeds and more especially of the Pocasset grant. Leaving the Ordinance of 1647 on one side for the moment, we are of opinion that that grant purported to convey the ponds and waterpower embraced within its boundaries to the grantees as private owners. It is argued that great ponds not being mentioned in the granting clause they must be taken to be excepted, and that the habendum cannot increase the gift. But no such technical argument can be allowed to prevail against the plain meaning of one of our early deeds, if it ever would have prevailed in a case like this anywhere. In the conveyances made early after the settlement of the country, artificial rules yield to the intention to be gathered from the four corners of the instrument, propter inopiam consilii. Ipswich Grammar School v. Andrews, 8 Met. 584, 592; Berry v. Raddin, 11 Allen, 577, 581.

It is argued also that the title of the grantees is to be dealt with on the same footing as the title of a town, and therefore as subject to the Ordinance of 1647 when that became the law. If so, then if the land at the outlet of the pond was held undivided by the original proprietors until after the Province Charter (1692), it might follow that the former decision in this case was still applicable. The Town of Tiverton was incorporated in 1694, with boundaries, it is said, nearly coincident with those of the Pocasset grant. Moreover we presume that there is no doubt that "in the early settlements in the country, proprietors, commoners and towns were often confounded." 2 Dane, Abr. 698. If we had before us a case where after a grant of land and a great pond to proprietors the same grantees or their successors were incorporated as a town and thereafter the town had assumed to act as the proprietor of the land and pond, and in that state of things the Ordinance of 1647 came into operation, we might hesitate to say that the pond was not within the scope of the ordinance. West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158, 171. But the elements of the case supposed or of any equivalent to it are wanting. The original conveyance, the Pocasset grant, is not a grant to or the incorporation of a town. It is a sale of land as private property to private individuals for a substantial sum of money. As we have said this sale embraced the water right now claimed. So far as appears, or as we have any reason to suspect, the whole land and water rights conveyed have been dealt with as private property from that day to this. There is no ground for saying that when the Ordinance of 1647 became law in the Plymouth Colony or at any later moment it found the Watuppa ponds the property of the Colony or of a town or in a like position for the purposes of the ordinance. We may add that the Town of Tiverton was not in existence until two years after the date of the Province Charter which it seems is to be taken as the date when the Ordinance of 1647 was extended to Plymouth. Litchfield v. Scituate, 136 Mass. 39, 46, 47.

There is no doubt, of course, that if the pond and the rights claimed by the plaintiffs had been appropriated to private persons before the ordinance went into effect those rights remained unaffected afterwards. Berry v. Raddin, 11 Allen, 577. Again we do not understand it to be disputed that if the original Pocasset grantees got a private right to the waterpower now used by the plaintiffs, and did not lose it at the date of the Province Charter, the plaintiffs now have it. It seems to be plain that whatever mill or water rights the Pocasset grantees had at the mouth of the pond they conveyed to the plaintiff's predecessors in title. Finally, if the whole of the Watuppa ponds was the subject of private ownership or if the colony retained a part of one subject to its conveyance of the rest to the Pocasset grantees, the other owner, whether the grantees of the Freeman's purchase or the colony, in its capacity of owner and apart from the exercise of sovereign powers, could not draw off the water to the detriment of the Pocasset grantees. See Tudor v. Cambridge Water Works, 1 Allen, 164; Smith v. Moodus Water P. Co. 38 Conn. 460.

The only question which remains is whether the Ordinance of 1647 modifies the conclusion to which we have come apart from it. This may be answered in a few words. In Litchfield v. Scituate, 136 Mass. 39, 46, it is said that there is no sufficient evidence that the ordinance was the law of Plymouth Colony before its union with Massachusetts under the Province Charter, and on the next page the time when the Province Charter passed the seals is indicated as the moment when we are to take it that the ordinance became applicable to that part of the State. It is true that when it did become applicable it became so as part of the common law and that the fiction generally applied in respect to the common law is that it is only declared by the courts and has existed immorially. But when the Ordinance of 1647 is said to be part of the common law of Plymouth all that is meant is that, as we said in Litchfield v. Scituate, it has been extended to that territory by usage and by judicial decision. Such an extension does not necessitate a fiction that the law has been so always, which would be as unreasonable as a change of private rights in the guise of a declaratory statute. It is fiction enough if we assume that the common law of Plymouth conformed to the ordinance from the date of the Province Charter, a date too late to affect the plaintiffs in this case. An illustration may be suggested from our common law as to prescription. This has conformed to the Statute of Limitations as they have been altered from time to time. Melvin v. Whiting, 10 Pick. 295, 297; Edson v. Munsell, 10 Allen, 557, 565; Coolidge v. Learned, 8 Pick. 504. But we do not suppose that it would be argued that when the Statute was changed the common law was changed for past time, retrospectively, so that, for instance, the use of a way for twenty years while the Statute of 1786, chap. 18, was in force should now be held to have gained a right, although at the time it was insufficient to do so.

There is no question made as to the remedy, if the plaintiff's rights are established. Tudor v. Cambridge Water Works, 1 Allen, 164.

We regard what we have said as sufficient to establish the rights of the Troy Cotton & Woolen Manufactory. It owns the land at the outlet of the pond. This being so, probably it is not regarded as material whether an injunction shall be issued in the case of the Watuppa Company also. That is a corporation made up of the representatives of the several mills owning waterpower on Fall River, but seems not itself to be an owner of land or water rights. We gather, however, from the facts admitted that it has built and is in possession of a dam at the outlet of the pond and controls the whole waterpower in the interest of the owners for their benefit. We are disposed to think that it shows a sufficient possession under the title of the owners to warrant the issuing of an injunction in its behalf.

Decree for plaintiffs.

NOTE.—Judges of Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims.

The judges of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims hold their offices while the court continues to exist, unless they are lawfully re-been paid upon such portion of the judgments as to substantially exhaust the fund applicable to them. Full payment was not necessary.

2. Each separate item of an account upon which suit is brought may be composed of several elements if all taken together constitute but a single item of charge upon the same subject matter.
3. The fees of commissioners appointed to take testimony by the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims are not regulated by U. S. Rev. Stat., § 847, but such commissioners may make any contract in regard to compensation which may be agreed upon.
4. In considering exceptions to rulings of the trial court in an action to recover compensation for acting as commissioners to take testimony under appointment by the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, the Supreme Court will not receive a copy of the instructions issued by that court to its commissioners; if material it should have been put in evidence at the trial.
5. An attorney's withdrawal from a case before it is finished, even without the consent of his client or the court, will not deprive him of the right to compensation for services already rendered, if it was for good cause upon reasonable notice and the client was not prejudiced thereby.

(September 5, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of two actions brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain promissory notes, and also to recover for services alleged to have been rendered by plaintiff to defendant, in which the court found for plaintiff. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jerome F. Manning, defendant, in propria persona.

Mr. H. L. Boutwell for plaintiff.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two actions of contract tried in the superior court, without a jury. In each case the presiding justice found for the plaintiff; and the case comes before us on the defendant's exceptions.

The first count in the first case is on a promissory note, dated July 11, 1884, by the terms of which the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff the sum of $685, "when the United States pays judgments of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims in the so-called class two cases."

The defendant asked the court to rule that this note did not become due and payable until the United States had paid all such judgments in full, and that this action, as to said note, had been prematurely brought.

The court refused so to rule, as it appeared at the trial that the United States had substantially paid all judgments of the first class in full, and had paid 85.22 per cent of the greater part of the judgments of the second class, and substantially exhausted the fund.

The Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims was constituted by the United States Statute of June 23, 1874, for the purpose of receiving and examining all claims, admissible under the Act, resulting from damage caused by the Alabama and other designated confederate cruisers. The claims allowed by this tribunal did not equal the amount of the award of the arbitrators appointed in pursuance of the Treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain, and which had been paid to the United States.

The Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims having ceased to exist, Congress, by the Act of June 5, 1882, re-established it for the term of two years. By § 4 it was authorized to receive and examine the claims mentioned in § 5, and to enter judgments for the amounts allowed therefor in two classes. Section 5 defines the claims of the two classes. Section 7 provides that the judgments rendered by the court under the Act shall be paid by the secretary of the treasury out of the sum of money paid to the United States under the Treaty of Washington, and not appropriated to claims proved under preceding legislation. Section 8 provides that "judgments entered in the first class shall be paid before judgments of the second class are paid. If the sum of money so appropriated shall be insufficient to pay the judgments of the first class, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the whole amount of such unappropriated sum. If such sum shall be sufficient to pay the judgments of the first class and not sufficient to pay the judgments of the second class, the latter judgments shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the residue of such unappropriated sum after the judgments entered in the first class are paid." 22 U. S. Stat. at Large, 98.

Construing the condition contained in the note in suit and the finding of the court in connection with the terms of this Statute, we are of opinion that the ruling requested was rightly refused.

The award of the arbitrators was to the United States as a nation; and the fund was "to be distributed by Congress as it saw fit. No individual claimant had, as matter of strict legal or equitable right, any lien upon the fund awarded, nor was Congress under any legal or equitable obligation to pay any claim out of the proceeds of that fund." Williams v. Heard, 140 U. S. 529, 587, 598, moved therefrom; and on continuance of the court for a further term they continue in office without the necessity of a reappointment. Manning v. French, 4 L. R. A. 339, 149 Mass. 391.

Jurisdiction, practice and procedure of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims. See notes to Kingsbury v. Mattocks (Me.) 3 L. R. A. 463.

The payment of the expenses of the Geneva Arbitration has not been charged by Congress upon 13 L. R. A.

the fund received under the award. United States v. Weld, 127 U. S. 51, 32 L. ed. 62.

The prohibition in the Act of 1874 concerning compensation for collecting such claims is limited to liens, sales or assignments creating a right of property in the claim itself, and not to personal agreements as to compensation. Bachman v. Lawson, 109 U. S. 650, 27 L. ed. 1067. See note to Kingsbury v. Mattocks (Me.) 3 L. R. A. 462.

35 L. ed. 550, 553, 554. When, therefore, the note in suit was made payable "when the United States pays judgments of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims in the so-called class two cases," the parties to the note had reference to claims which could be enforced only under the terms of the Statute, which were to be paid out of a specific fund, in subordination to cases of the first class, and which were in a certain contingency to be paid proportionally.

The remaining exception in the first case may be briefly disposed of. The second count is on an account annexed, which contained over twenty items. The defendant objected to several of these items on the ground that the plaintiff sought in each of them to recover for services in several different matters, and the defendant asked the court to rule that the plaintiff could recover for but one matter of charge under each of said items, and also asked the court to rule that there could be no recovery on any of said items. The court found upon the evidence, as a fact, that the different matters mentioned in each of said items constituted one item of charge upon the same subject matter; and refused to give the rulings requested. One of these items is as follows: "1885, Dec. 8. To letter to Payson and Speer, and two page letter to Brigham, $3."

If these letters related to the same subject matter, we are unable to see why one charge might not be made, and why, being so charged, they could not be inserted in one item. The other items are similar and fall within the same rule.

The case of Jones v. Holey, 1 Allen, 273, on which the defendant relies, is clearly distinguishable. The defendant in that case filed a declaration in set-off, one item of which was as follows: "To goods sold, materials found, and work done, $100."

At the hearing before an auditor, the defendant introduced evidence of several distinct matters of charge under said item. At the trial this item was disallowed. In delivering the opinion of the court, Chapman, J., said: "The item in the account in set-off, 'To goods sold, materials found, and work done, $100,' should not have been entirely rejected. In many cases all these particulars may enter into a single item of charge. And any single thing of which that item gives reasonable notice might have been proved. But it appears that the auditor allowed the defendant to prove several particulars, with the various prices of the same, under this single item. This was erroneous. Under a single item of his bill, the defendant should have been limited to the proof of a single article."

In the second case, one of the counts was on an account annexed in which the plaintiff sought to recover on an oral agreement made between himself and the defendant, by which the defendant promised to pay him at the rate of $20 a day for every business day in which he was engaged in taking depositions, as a commissioner appointed by the Court of Alabama Claims, for the defendant. Other counts were upon promissory notes, the consideration of which was services rendered as such commissioner and as an attorney.

The charges for such services are found by the court not to conform either in form or amount, to the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 847. The defendant asked the court to rule "that the plaintiff, as commissioner of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, was a public officer; that the fees to which he was entitled for services as such commissioner were regulated by the Revised Statutes of the United States, § 847; and that he can recover no more fees than those prescribed in the said section, even though the defendant expressly agreed to pay him more; and also that, having made a special contract in reference to his fees which is opposed to public policy, the plaintiff cannot recover on a quantum meruit. The court refused so to rule, and found for the plaintiff.

Section 847, U. S. Rev. Stat., is entitled "Commissioners' Fees," and prescribes what are the legal fees of such persons. Section 823 of the same chapter provides that "the following and no other compensation shall be taxed and allowed to attorneys, solicitors, and proctors in the courts of the United States, to district attorneys, clerks of the circuit and district courts, marshals, commissioners, . . . except in cases otherwise expressly provided by law. But nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit attorneys, solicitors, and proctors from charging to and receiving from their clients, other than the government, such reasonable compensation for their services, in addition to the taxable costs, as may be in accordance with general usage in their respective States, or may be agreed upon between the parties."

The commissioners mentioned in the above sections are undoubtedly the commissioners authorized by section 627 of the United States Revised Statutes, to be appointed by each circuit court. This was expressly so decided by Judge Choate in Sedgwick v. Grinnell, 10 Ben. 6, and is apparent from a consideration of all the provisions of the chapter. Thus, by § 846, the accounts of "commissioners of circuit courts" are required to be examined and certified by the district judge of the district for which they are appointed. The fees which are allowed them by § 847, are for services imposed upon commissioners of the circuit court by other sections of the Revised Statutes.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the fees of the plaintiff, as commissioner are not regulated by U. S. Rev. Stat., § 847. It is accordingly unnecessary to determine whether the words in section 823, "the following and no other compensation shall be taxed and allowed to . . . commissioners," refer to anything more than the costs which may be taxed for their services, or to their claims against the government of the United States, when acting in a judicial or ministerial capacity, and prevent them from making a contract for services on such terms as may be agreed upon.

At the argument in this court, the defendant produced a certified copy of certain instructions, which on June 5, 1883, the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims directed its clerk to issue "to commissioners appointed and authorized to take testimony to be used in the trial of causes pending before it." We declined to receive this copy, being of the opinion that if the instructions had any bearing upon the question of the power of the parties to make the alleged contract for fees, they should have been put in evidence at the trial of the case. We see no reason to change our views.

The plaintiff also seeks to recover, on an account annexed, for services rendered to the defendant, as an attorney and counsellor at law, in the courts of this Commonwealth, and in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The plaintiff testified that he withdrew from the defendant's service, as attorney and counsellor-at-law, on February 2, 1886, and on that day gave the defendant and all his opponents notice in writing of his withdrawal; that the case of Amy against Manning was then upon the trial list; that Charles Cowley, Esq., also appeared for the defendant, and that such withdrawal was without the consent of the court or of his defendant. The defendant asked the court to rule that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action for any services performed by him in defending the action of Amy against Manning in this court, because he withdrew therefrom, before the trial thereof, without the consent of the defendant or of the court. Also that the same rule of law applied to all actions pending where the defendant was a party and the plaintiff was his counsel, when the plaintiff withdrew therefrom. The judge found from the evidence that the conduct of said Manning was such that the plaintiff was fully justified in withdrawing from said suits, and that said Manning had other counsel, and suffered no damage on account of said withdrawals and declined to give the rulings requested.

The defendant relies, in support of his proposition that an attorney cannot withdraw his appearance for a party without leave of court, upon the case of United States v. Curry, 47 U. S. 6 How. 106, 12 L. ed. 863, where language to this effect is used by Chief Justice Taney. The point decided in that case was that the citation or notice of an appeal might be served upon the attorney of record of the appellees, while his name remained upon the docket of the court below, although he had in fact been discharged by his clients. The remark of the chief justice is not to be taken as the statement of a general principle, apart from the question before the court. That it was not so intended is shown by the context. The entire quotation is as follows: "So, too, as to the service of the citation on the attorney. It is undoubtedly good, and according to the established practice in courts of chancery. No attorney or solicitor can withdraw his name, after he has once entered it on the record, without the leave of the court. And, while his name continues there, the adverse party has a right to treat him as the authorized attorney or solicitor, and the service of notice upon him is as valid as if served on the party himself." See also De la 13 L. R. A.

Pole v. Dick, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 351, 3d Common Law Rule of this court; 23d Equity Rule.

No case has been called to our attention which holds that, as between an attorney and his client, leave of court is required before a contract between them can be ended.

It is stated in 1 Tidd, Pr. 9th ed. 86, that "when an attorney once appears, or undertakes to be attorney for another, he shall not be permitted to withdraw himself; and it is said to be his duty to proceed in the suit, although his client neglect to bring him money,"—citing 1 Sid. 31. This, however, is not the law of England or of this country to-day.

The question was thoroughly considered in England in the case of Vansandau v. Browne, 9 Bing. 402, and it was held that an attorney might for reasonable cause and upon reasonable notice, abandon the conduct of a case, and recover his fees. In regard to the case in Siderfin, Tindal, Ch. J., said: "Now in the report in Siderfin no facts are stated to explain the decision of the court. It may be, probably was, the fact, that the attorney on the very day of the assizes deserted the conduct of the cause, giving his client neither time nor opportunity to obtain other professional assistance; if so, the decision of the court was proper." See also Rousson v. Earle, M. & M. 538; Wadsworth v. Marshall, 2 Crompt. & J. 665; Whitehead v. Lord, 7 Exch. 691; Harris v. Osbourn, 2 Crompt. & M. 629.

In Elliot v. Lawton, 7 Allen, 274, it was held, in accordance with the English decisions, that the contract of an attorney with his client was an entire and continuous contract; and that the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the final service was performed. In answer to the objection that by holding the service to be entire the attorney would be precluded from enforcing any claim for services until the final termination of the suit, Mr. Justice Dewey, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "To this it has been answered that such would be the effect, if nothing has occurred to change the relation of the parties and their duties to each other; but from the nature of this contract it may be terminated previous to the termination of the suit, for a good and sufficient cause, and upon reasonable notice. Hence it has been holden that failure to supply reasonable funds, or any other substantial cause for not further proceeding in the case, would justify the attorney in withdrawing from it, and in such a case a present right to enforce his claim for past services would arise, and of course also from that period the Statute of Limitations would commence running."

In Rush v. Cavanaugh, 2 Pa. 187, which was an action for slander, the plaintiff, an attorney, collected a sum of money for the defendant, and retained it for his fees. The defendant thereupon called him a thief, robber, and cheat. One question raised was whether the plaintiff, who had been employed by the defendant to prosecute a person criminally, was entitled to any fees, having abandoned the prosecution. It was held that if he were satisfied of the innocence of the accused, he was entitled to abandon the prosecution, and recover compensation; and that he was not, to quote the language of Gibson, Ch. J., "bound to give credence to the instructions of a heated client, rather than to the sober testimony of a dispassionate witness."

In Tenney v. Berger, 98 N. Y. 524, it was held that the employment by the client, without the consent of his attorney, of counsel against whom the attorney had personal and professional objections, and with whom he was unwilling to be associated, was a justifiable cause for his withdrawal from a case; and that, upon reasonable notice of such withdrawal, he was entitled to recover for services rendered.

In the case at bar, we are of opinion that, on the facts found, the presiding judge rightly refused to rule as requested by the defendant.

The only remaining exception relates to a promissory note payable "when the United States pays judgments of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims." This is disposed of by the conclusion we have reached on a similar question in the first case.

The result is that in each case the order must be—

Exceptions overruled.

13 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lem Le B. Holmes and Elliot D. Stetson for appellant.

Mr. W. H. Cobb for appellee.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The transportation of the plaintiff's horses was under an express contract. This contract was prepared by the railroad company, and called "Live Stock Receipt." In it the company acknowledged the receipt of the two horses marked for the plaintiff at New Bedford, Mass., "which the company promises to forward by its railroad, and deliver to or order at its depot in . . . He or they first paying freight for the same." "N. B. If merchandise be not called for on its arrival, it will be stored at the risk and expense of the owner." Then followed the rates for transporting different kinds of animals; after which were certain rules and regulations in regard to freight. Among these rules were the following: "Nor will they [the company] hold themselves liable as common carriers for such articles after their arrival at their place of destination and unloading in the company's warehouses or depots." "Machinery . . . and live animals will only be taken at the owner's risk of fracture or injury during the course of transportation, loading and unloading, unless specially agreed to the contrary." "All articles of freight arriving at their place of destination must be taken away within twenty-four hours after being unladen from the cars."

The plaintiff paid for the transportation of the horses on their arrival at New Bedford, and took a receipt which contained the same rules and regulations copied above, and applied for his horses; and the agent of the railroad company refused to unload the horses, and required the plaintiff to unload them.

In the opinion of a majority of the court the railroad company must be held under this contract to have undertaken to unload the horses, though at the owner's risk. This contract was made out with express reference to the carriage of live animals. The railroad company promised to deliver them, and this implies unloading them. The company would also store them, unless called for, and this also implies unloading them. There are three several stipulations as to unloading goods, one of which in express terms includes live animals, and each of which implies that the company will unload them. It must therefore be held that the company undertook to unload them.

This being so, a usage of the company's agent at New Bedford to require the owner or consignee to unload live animals is of no

A rule and regulation of the company can have no greater effect. The company's rule requiring consignees to unload livestock was not otherwise known to the plaintiff than this; he knew that the company's agent at New Bedford had been accustomed to require consignees to unload their horses. But it well known, it must still give way to the contract. It was a matter of contract between the plaintiff and the railroad company that the company should unload the plaintiff's horses. This being so, neither a usage nor a rule to the contrary will avail to excuse the company from the performance of its undertaking. In this respect, the case differs from Miller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 260, and other cases, where there was no such contract.

NOTE.—Accident insurance; warranty in application for insurance.

A warranty, in an application against "bodily or mental infirmity," is not broken by the fact that the applicant was near-sighted and defective in his vision, especially if he at that time wore eyeglasses and this was known to the insurance agent. Cotten v. Fidelity & C. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 506.

A warranty that he never had "any bodily or mental infirmity" is not broken by the fact that he was subject to erysipelas. Bernays v. United States Mut. Acc. Asso. 45 Fed. Rep. 455.

Interpretation of contract.

A contract of insurance must have a reasonable interpretation, such as probably was in the contemplation of the parties when it was made. Grandin v. Rochester German Ins. Co. 107 Pa. 26.

Where the terms of a policy are susceptible, without violence, of two interpretations, that construction which is most favorable to the insured, in order to indemnify him against loss sustained should be adopted. *Teutonia F. 2. The burden of proving voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger as a defense to an action for accident insurance is on the insurer.

3. Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, which will prevent recovery of accident insurance, is not shown by the fact that the insured while waiting for a train was thrown or fell upon the track from a platform not intended for use in getting upon his train or in fact for use by passengers at all, though they sometimes used it, but for train hands, and which was only about two and a half feet wide in places where girders extended out from the wall.

4. Leaving a car while in motion is not necessarily "a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" which will defeat a recovery on a policy which by its terms is avoided by such exposure.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Gaston & Whitney, for defendant:

The effect of the first condition of the policy is to prevent a recovery, if it appears affirmatively that the negligence of the deceased was a contributing cause of his death.

Freeman v. Travelers Ins. Co. 4 New Eng. Rep. 621, 144 Mass. 572.

The conduct of the deceased, as disclosed by the facts admitted and proved by the plaintiff, was such as to require the court to rule affirmatively that, as a matter of law, the negligence

Conditions in policy; burden of proof of breach.

The burden of proving the breach of a condition in the policy "that insured shall use all due diligence for his personal safety and protection," is on the company. *Freeman v. Travelers Ins. It is clear, as a matter of law, that the death of the insured was due to his own negligence or voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, upon any theory which the jury would have been authorized to adopt, upon the evidence, as to the precise manner in which he came to be under the wheels of the train.

W. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The promise of the defendant was to pay a certain sum in the event of the death of the plaintiff's intestate occasioned by "bodily injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means."

There are nine provisos in the certificate, the last of which is that "no suit or proceeding at law or in equity shall be brought to recover any sum herein, unless the same has been first referred to the arbitration of just and competent men." It was admitted that there had been no reference to arbitration of the plaintiff's claim, and that the plaintiff never requested such arbitration. The first exception is to the refusal of the court to rule that, for that reason, the action could not be maintained. The promise is, not to pay the award, but to pay the sum named, and the proviso does not make the award a condition precedent to the promise to pay, but a mode of enforcing that promise. It is well settled that such an agreement is no bar to an action on the promise. Reed v.

"Lifting and over exertion" must be a voluntary and unnecessary act, and not an act put forth to Washington F. & M. Ins. Co. 188 Mass. 872, and cases cited.

The certificate also contains the proviso that "members are required to use all due diligence for personal safety and protection; and that "no claim shall be made under this certificate where death or injury may have happened in consequence . . . of any voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." These provisos constitute matter of defense and the burden of proving them is upon the defendant. Freeman v. Travelers Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572, 4 New Eng. Rep. 621. The other exceptions are to the refusals of the court to rule upon the undisputed evidence in the case, and upon the hypothetical findings of the jury upon the evidence, that the defense of want of due diligence or of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger by the deceased was made out, and to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant.

After the ten o'clock train left, the dead body of the plaintiff's intestate was found on the track where the train had stood in such a situation and condition as showed that he had been run over by the train and instantly killed. Track No. 8 was the easterly track and was near the easterly wall of the train house. A platform extended from the wall toward the track so far that a car upon the track would overhang the platform about six inches. The distance from the wall to the edge of the platform was about five and one half feet, but there were girders extending inward from the wall about three feet so that the distance from the face of the girders to the edge of the platform was about two and a half feet.

"There was evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff, before ten o'clock in the forenoon was waiting in the train house of a railroad station in Boston to take a train that left at a quarter after 10 on track No. 7, and that he knew that a train left on track No. 8 at 10 o'clock."

The defendant contended, and there was evidence to prove, that the platform east of the tracks was intended for the use of the train hands and not for passengers, though it was sometimes used by them, and that the place intended for and generally used by passengers for taking and leaving cars on track No. 8 was the platform on the westerly side of that track between it and track No. 7.

The supposition that the deceased fell in attempting to get on or off any platform of the cars while they were in motion seems inconsistent with the evidence. The only theory of accidental injury consistent with the evidence seems to be that the deceased was thrown or fell from the platform east of the cars, upon the rail between the front and rear trucks of the forward car about the time the cars started and before they had moved twenty feet. There was no evidence of the cause of his fall, and it cannot be contended that the mere fact that he fell under the car save one's self from being crushed by a descending weight. Reynolds v. Equitable Acc. Assn. 59 Hun, 18.

Whether insured was guilty of voluntary exposure to danger is a question for the jury. Cotten v. Fidelity & C. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 506. See notes to Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 444; Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Wis.) 9 L. R. A. 687.

Payment of premium.

A cash payment by an accident insurance company to the assured on account of an injury received, to which he was not entitled unless the installments of premium had been paid, did not raise a conclusive presumption that all such installments had in fact been paid. Melin v. North American Acc. Ins. Co. 70 Wis. 579.

Where an agent solicits an ignorant negro porter of a railroad company to take insurance, and offers to take an order on the company for the premium, and the policy is delivered to the porter before the company can forfeit the policy for nonpayment of premium, in case it cannot realize on the order, it must give the insured notice of its nonpayment. *Bury v. Limitation of right to sue.

The provision that the action should be brought "within one year from the time of the alleged accidental injury," means a year from the time the right of action was complete. Cooper v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 32 N. Y. S. R. 725.

The limitation of a year runs during the minority of the beneficiaries where there is no exception in their favor. Suggs v. Travelers Ins. Co. 71 Tex. 579.

Notice of accident.

The requirement of an immediate written notice of an accident, means that notice must be given within a reasonable time. People's Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Smith, 126 Pa. 317.

Contributory negligence not a defense.

Contributory negligence on the part of the insured is not a defense, and by the use of the word "accidental," injuries to which the negligence of the insured contributed are not excluded from the protection of the policy. Freeman v. Travelers Ins. Co. 4 New Eng. Rep. 621, 144 Mass. 572; Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28; Trew v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 6 Hurst. & N. 539; Providence L. Ins. & I. Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 810; Stone v. United States Casualty Co. 34 N. J. L. 371.

Proof of nature, cause, or manner of death.

The requirement, in an accident insurance policy, of direct and positive proof of the nature, cause, or manner of death, does not make it necessary to establish the fact by persons actually present at the death. Accident Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Bennett (Tenn.) June 6, 1891.

is a defense. The real contention of the defendant, expressed in different forms in its prayers for instructions, is, that the mere fact that the deceased was in a dangerous place (on the platform east of the track), or, as stated in one prayer for instructions, doing a dangerous act (leaving a car while it was in motion), is, as matter of law, conclusive proof that he did not use all due diligence for personal safety and protection, and that he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger.

This is not an action against the railroad company in which the mutual rights and duties of a person injured and the company are involved.

As regards the defendant, the deceased had a right to go upon the platform, and to examine the wall of the building, and the girders and the platform and the cars standing upon the track and to enter and leave them. None of these acts would of itself be evidence of want of due diligence for personal safety or of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. Any of them might be done carefully or carelessly. The manner and circumstances of the act would give character to it.

The facts that the deceased was upon the platform, and that he was injured in the manner shown, clearly do not constitute negligence in law or afford conclusive evidence of negligence.

The defendant asked for instructions upon the hypothesis that deceased fell while leaving the car when it was in motion. There was no evidence that he so fell, but if it could be inferred it would not be conclusive of his negligence. That would depend upon the circumstances, and there would be no presumption that the circumstances were such as to make it negligent. If the jury could surmise that he left the car when it was in motion under circumstances which rendered the act negligent, they could equally well surmise that he left it under circumstances which would show that the act was not negligent. It may be said, in general, in regard to each of the defendant's prayers for rulings and instructions, that there is no evidence of the act of the deceased proximate to his injury and of course no evidence of the circumstances which characterize the act as negligent or otherwise. If the jury infer an act they are not, without evidence, at liberty to infer the circumstances which made the act negligent. The jury could not properly find their verdict upon particular facts found without evidence. The real question was whether the facts directly proved by the evidence and those inferred from them sustained the burden of proof which was upon the defendant, and this was clearly a question for the jury and not for the court, unless the court could rule that there was not sufficient evidence. The instructions gave were sufficiently favorable to the defendant.

Exceptions overruled.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

EQUITABLE ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO., Appt.,

v.

Laura OSBORN, Admx., etc., of John Osborn, Deceased.

(90 Ala. 201.)

1. A general denial which puts in issue the execution of an insurance policy should be verified under the Alabama Code.
2. A plea which states only legal conclusions instead of facts is demurrable.
3. A variance is created by proof of a policy which specifies no time for its continuance under a complaint which describes it as running for one year from a certain date.

4. A man is not guilty of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a policy because he runs toward an approaching train, which does not stop there, to get the mail and stumbles and falls down a bank against the engine.

(November Term, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the NOTE.—Scope, nature and effect of verification.

The Codes of all States which have adopted the reformed system of procedure contain provisions in regard to verification of pleadings. In all cases of a verification of pleading, the affidavit of the party must state that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are therein stated on his information or belief, and as to those matters, that he believes it to be true; and where a pleading is verified, it must be by the affidavit of a party, unless the parties are absent from the county where the attorney resides, or from cause are unable to verify it, or the facts are within the knowledge of his attorney or other person verifying the same. When the pleading is verified by the attorney, or other person except one of the parties, he must set forth in the affidavit the reason why it is not made by one of the parties. When a corporation is a party, the verification may be made by an officer thereof. See 1 Estee, Pl. § 273.

The object of the verification is to secure good faith in the averments of the party. Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. 28.

An answer may be verified though the complaint is not. In such case a reply must be verified. Levi v. Jakeways, 4 How. Pr. 120, 2 Code Rep. 66; Lin v. Jaquays, 2 Code Rep. 23.

Courts lean against objections on the ground of insufficient verification. Wilkin v. Gilman, 18 How. Pr. 225.

The verification constitutes no part of a pleading, but when any pleading is verified every subsequent pleading, except a demurrer, or the general answer of an infant by his guardian ad litem, must also be verified. See N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 523; Reynolds v. Smathers, 87 N. C. 24; Alford v. McCormac, 90 N. C. 151; Crompton v. Crow, 2 Utah, 245; Boone, Code Pl. § 34.

Verification is only required to be adopted to the mode of statement in the pleading. If the mode of amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. G. R. Harsh and Bowman & Harsh for appellant.

Mr. E. T. Taliaferro for appellee.

Somerville, J., delivered the opinion of court:

1. The first plea of the defendant, being a general denial of all the allegations of the complaint, necessarily put in issue the execution of the written policy of insurance which was the foundation of the suit, as well as the plaintiff's ownership of the policy, as the beneficiary under it. The plea should therefore have been supported by affidavit, and for want of such verification it was subject to the demurrer which was interposed to it, and was properly sustained by the trial court. Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Gilmer, 85 Ala. 423; Code 1886, §§ 2676, 2770; Manning v. Maroney, 87 Ala. 568.

2. The third plea was too vague and uncertain in its averments, and therefore necessarily ambiguous in meaning. It, moreover, states legal conclusions instead of facts, and was subject to demurrer on these and other grounds sustained by the court. Carmelich v. Mims, 88 Ala. 335.

3. The fourth plea was subject to like objections, as stated in the demurrer to it.

4. The court erred in not sustaining the plaintiff's motion to exclude the policy of insurance on the ground of variance. The complaint describes the policy as running for the term of one year from date, which was February 18, 1888. We discover nothing in the terms of the policy, or in the other evidence, which indicates how long the risk was to run. This may be an inadvertent omission; but, as the bill of exceptions purports to contain all the evidence, the objection to the admission of the policy should have been sustained. In addition to this, we may observe that the evidence shows that the accident which produced the death of the insured happened on May 30, 1889, or more than a year after the issue of the policy, and the risk was not, therefore, covered by the time for which the policy described in the complaint was to remain in force. This, of itself, is fatal to any recovery, as the facts of the case now stand.

5. The policy insures against death and certain other injuries, effected through "external, violent, and accidental means." That the death of the insured resulted from precisely such a cause, the evidence leaves no doubt. The insured came speedily to his death by stumbling and falling, as he ran towards the railroad track upon the approach of a passenger train, coming in sudden contact with the steam-chest on the side of a railway engine. The injury, therefore, comes within the general terms of the policy, unless taken out by some one of the exceptions.

6. One of the exceptions, not covered by the policy, is "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." It is contended that the facts of the present case bring it within the terms of this exception. The phrase, "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" involves the idea of "intentionally doing some act which reasonable and ordinary prudence would pronounce dangerous." As said in an analogous case, where the same phrase was construed: "The approach to an unknown and unexpected danger does not make the act a voluntary exposure thereto. The result of the act does not necessarily determine the motive which prompted the action.

statement is absolute, then the verification should be absolute, but if the mode of statement is qualified, then the verification should be qualified. Orvis v. Goldschmidt, 64 How. Pr. 71, 2 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 314.

A defect in the verification of a complaint or petition may be waived, and will be deemed waived where no objection is made until after the rendition of the judgment. Dorrington v. Meyer, 8 Neb. 214; 2 Boone, Code Pl. 5.

Mode of verification.

As a general rule, every pleading should be verified by the party pleading; but for convenience and from necessity, many exceptions to the rule are allowed. Thus, when an artificial person, as a private corporation, is a party, the pleading may be verified by any of its officers; and when the State is a party, the verification may be made by anyone acquainted with the facts. N. Y. Code, § 157.

So, where a party cannot verify a pleading by reason of absence at the time such verification becomes necessary, his attorney may verify the pleading for him. Stannard v. Mattice, 7 How. Pr. 4; People v. Allen, 14 How. Pr. 334; Roscoe v. Mason, 7 How. Pr. 121; Treadwell v. Fassett, 10 How. Pr. 184; Lefevre v. Latson, 5 Sandf. 660, 10 N. Y. Legal Obs. 246; Boston Locomotive Works v. Wright, 15 How. Pr. 263; 2 Wait, Pr. 638.

Verification by agent or attorney.

A verification to a pleading, made by an agent, which states that "all the material allegations . . . 13 L. R. A.

are with his personal knowledge," is sufficient without assigning any reason why the verification is not made by the party. Betts v. Krindell, 13 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 157.

Verification by defendant's agent, stating after the usual form that the reason why it was not made by defendant was, that the allegations were within the agent's personal knowledge and not within that of the defendant, was held good. It was also held that the exception as to those matters stated on information, etc., might have been omitted. Ross v. Longmuir, 15 Abb. Pr. 323, 24 How. Pr. 49.

A pleading verified by an attorney, stating, as the ground for his verification, that he could not find the party in the city, and that it was his last day to reply, is not good as it states no legal reason why the verification is not made by the party. It may be treated as a nullity. Lyons v. Murat, 54 How. Pr. 23.

Where verification of an answer, made by the defendant's agent or attorney, contains an allegation inconsistent with an allegation in the answer, defendant may be required to verify in person. Jailard v. Tomes, 3 Abb. N. C. 24.

It seems that under Code Civ. Proc., § 2533, which provides that "the surrogate may require the petition or answer to be verified," he has authority to compel the verifications of objections to an account filed with him. Thompson v. Mott, 2 Dem. 154.

Verification by corporation.

When the verification is by an officer of a corporation, it is in fact the verification of the corporation, and the form is that of a party to the action,

The act may be voluntary, yet the exposure involuntary. The danger being unknown, the injury is accidental." Burkhard v. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, 102 Pa. 262. Death by accident has been defined to be "death from any unexpected event which happens as by chance, or which does not take place according to the usual course of things" (North American L. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43), and again, as "any event which takes place without foresight or expectation of the person acted upon or affected by the event." May, Ins. 2d ed. § 520. So it is said in 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 87: "An accident, in its application to insurance policies, has been defined as an injury which happens by reason of some violence, casualty, or vis major to the assured, without his design or consent or voluntary co-operation." See also Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28; Tuttle v. Travelers & Acc. Ins. Co. 184 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 316-319, note.

The evidence in the record fails to satisfy us that the insured was guilty of voluntarily exposing himself to unnecessary danger, and any degree of negligence short of this will not operate to defeat a recovery. May, Ins. 2d ed. § 530. He was approaching the arriving railway train, for the purpose of getting the mail for the postmaster. True, he was moving rapidly; but he made an effort to check his speed as he reached the sloping bank which led down to the side track of the railroad; and in doing this he stumbled, and came in collision with the engine. But for the accident of stumbling, the inference is fair that he would not have been injured. The efficient and proximate cause of the death, therefore, was the accident, as much as if the collision had been with a huge stone, instead of with the steam-chest on the side of the engine. The injury received was clearly not "intentional" within the meaning of one of the exceptions of the policy. Nor, in our opinion, can it be properly construed to be a "walking or being on a railroad bridge or road-bed," within the meaning of another excepted class of cases contained in the policy, as is contended for by the appellant. Exceptions of this kind are construed most strongly against the insurer, and liberally in favor of the insured. This is now the settled rule for construing all kinds of insurance policies, rendered necessary, especially in modern times, to circumvent the ingenuity of the insurance companies in so framing contracts of this kind so as to make the exceptions unfairly devour the whole policy. Accordingly, in Wright v. Sun Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 U. C. C. P. 221 (1878), a well-considered case of insurance against accidents, it was held that using a railroad track merely to cross a street, through which it ran, was not a "walking on the track" within the meaning of a prohibition of the policy, for accidents resulting from which no liability was to be incurred. A fair and reasonable construction of the phrase in question is: Voluntarily and intentionally being or walking on the railway road-bed, not being there by force of accident, and involuntarily, for a mere comparative moment of time. Burkhard v. Travelers Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 262; Scheiderer v. Travelers Ins. Co. 58 Wis. 13; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 92.

These principles will be sufficient, without more, to enable the court below upon another trial to reach a proper conclusion.

Reversed and remanded.

and need not state the grounds of belief. Glaubenskie v. Hamburg & A. P. Co. 9 Abb. Pr. 104.

The managing agent of a foreign corporation having charge of all its business, and on whom the process in the action was served, may verify its answer as an officer of the corporation, and without stating the grounds of his belief. Ibid.

The verification of a pleading made by the secretary of a corporation may be in the usual form of a verification by a party, and need not set forth the grounds of the officer's belief as to all matters stated on his knowledge, and the reason why the verification is not made by the party. The verification is the verification by the corporation, and therefore a verification by a party. American Insulator Co. v. Bankers and M. Teleg. Co. 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 443.

Miscellaneous considerations.

In all cases when the verification may be omitted, the criterion is whether, if called as a witness, the party would be excused from answering. If there is more than one party, and anyone would be privileged, verification may be omitted; so, if any part of the pleadings would excuse a party from testifying. Clapper v. Fitzpatrick, 8 How. Pr. 314, 1 Code Rep. 66; Blaisdell v. Raymond, 5 Abb. Pr. 144, affirmed, 6 Abb. Pr. 148; Henry v. Bank of Salina, 1 N. Y. 83.

The code provisions allowing an omission of the verification apply only where the accusatory matter is contained in the pleading to be answered. Fredericks v. Taylor, 52 N. Y. 596, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 77.

Long retention of an unverified bill of particulars, which have been verified, waives the irregularity. Paine v. Smith, 32 Wis. 385.

A garnishee's omission to verify his answer, or to serve it in time, cannot be objected to after joining issue thereon and going to trial. Kirby v. Corning, 54 Wis. 599.

A verification by attorney, setting forth a sufficient statutory ground of belief, is not vitiated by the statement of other real or supposed grounds of belief. Market Nat. Bank v. Hagan, 21 Wis. 317.

A verification is sufficient which states that the party "has read the foregoing petition, and is acquainted with the contents thereof; that the same is true of his own knowledge and belief." The words "and belief" may be treated as surplusage. Seattle Coal & T. Co. v. Thomas, 57 Cal. 197.

Party may serve with pleading an affidavit, excusing verification. Blaisdell v. Raymond, 5 Abb. Pr. 144 affirmed, 6 Abb. Pr. 148.

Where the affidavit of a defendant to his answer states that the matters set forth in the foregoing answer are true, except as to those matters therein stated on information or belief, and as to those matters that he believes them to be true, it is a sufficient verification; it is not necessary that the defendant should state in the affidavit that he has heard the answer read, and knows the contents thereof. Fleming v. Wells, 65 Cal. 336.

The omission to verify is an irregularity which may be waived, and the right to take advantage of it is lost by long delay. Wilson v. Bennett, 2 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 34.

(....Minn.....)

*1. To constitute an estoppel in pais, an actual fraudulent intent in making the representation is not necessary. It is enough that the person making it knows, or ought to know, the truth; that he intends, or might reasonably anticipate, that the person to whom it is made, or to whom it is to be communicated, will rely and act on it as true; and that the latter has relied and acted on it, so that to permit the former to deny its truth will operate as a fraud.

— *Head notes by GILFILLAN, Ch. J.

NOTE.—“Equitable estoppel” defined.

Equitable estoppel is the effect of voluntary conduct of a party, whereby he is precluded, both at law and in equity, from asserting the rights which might perhaps have otherwise existed as against another, who has, in good faith, relied thereon, and has been led thereby to change his position for the worse, and who on his part acquires some corresponding right, either of property, of contract, or of remedy. Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 618.

The conduct must be something which amounts either to a representation, or to a concealment of the present or past existence of a fact. Ibid. See Bigelow, Estoppel, 486; Jackson v. Allen, 120 Mass. 64; Langdon v. Doud, 10 Allen, 438; White v. Ashton, 51 N. Y. 280; White v. Walker, 31 Ill. 422.

One who makes representations cannot withdraw or deny them to the prejudice of a third person who has acted upon them in good faith, even though there is no preconceived design to defraud. Babcock v. People's Sav. Bank, 118 Ind. 212; Anderson v. Hubble, 98 Ind. 670; Ward v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 6 West. Rep. 506, 106 Ind. 301.

So the acts and declarations of the holder of a mortgage may be so instrumental in altering the position of a party as to make it inequitable for one to enforce the mortgage against the other. Burke v. Grant, 2 West. Rep. 384, 116 Ill. 124.

2. One making representations, relating to his business, to a commercial agency, may be estopped as to its patrons to whom it communicates such representations; as where defendant so represented that he was the owner of a business concern known as the “New York Pie Company,” and that representation was communicated by the agency to plaintiff, one of its patrons.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Municipal Court of the City of Minneapolis denying his motion for new trial of an action brought to hold defendant liable upon a bill of exchange drawn upon the New York Pie Company and accepted by its manager, in to do what was done, he is estopped to deny it. Ibid. See notes to Brookhaven v. Smith (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 755; Galbraith v. Lunsford (Tenn.) 1 L. R. A. 522.

Equitable estoppel, when arises.

An equitable estoppel arises when one party by his faulty conduct has induced his adversary to omit some act which, but for said fault and negligence, he would have performed, and which, if done, might have prevented the loss. Wilson Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Southern Exp. Co. 43 La. Ann. 593. See Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 108, 29 L. ed. 816.

Positive fraud is not required to work an equitable estoppel, where silence or conduct has created a belief of the existence of a state of facts which it would be unconscionable to deny. Alexander v. Woodford Spring Lake Fish Co. (Ky.) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 107.

So one who represents himself as the owner of a bull which inflicted an injury, for the purpose of misleading the party injured, so as to deprive him of his right of action against the real owner, is estopped to deny that he is the owner. Baird v. Vaughn (Tenn.) Dec. 13, 1890.

A party may by his declarations and conduct, and even by his silence or negative omission to act, estop himself from claiming his rights, where such claim would operate to the injury of another. Trenton Bkg. Co. v. Duncan, 38 N. Y. 223; Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. 344, 1 L. ed. 165.

It is the dictate of natural justice that he, who, having a right or interest, by his conduct influences another to act on the faith of its non-existence, or implies that it will not be asserted, shall not be allowed afterward to maintain it to that other's prejudice. McGovern v. Knox, 21 Ohio St. 547.

The doctrine has been applied to estates in land, trust funds, things in action, and other forms of interest, in some defensively, in others as the ground of affirmative relief. See 2 Pom. Eq. 239.

A fraudulent intent is necessary to create an estoppel affecting the legal title to land. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 103, 2 L. ed. 83.

It is an act of fraud for a party, conscious of his own right, to suffer another, ignorant of that right, to go on, purchase property, and make improvements thereon. Ibid.; Miller v. Platt, 5 Duer, 238; Durham v. Alden, 20 Me. 223, 37 Am. Dec. 49; Hatch v. Kimball, 16 Me. 146.

Doctrine of estoppel in pais.

The doctrine of estoppel in pais is applicable to one who has induced another to occupy a position he would not have occupied but for the acts of the which judgment had been directed in plaintiff's favor. Affirmed.

At the trial the court found that defendant had stated to representatives of various commercial agencies, who called upon him in their official capacity, that he was sole proprietor of the New York Pie Company; that this information was communicated by the agencies to plaintiff, one of their subscribers, who in good faith acted thereon in extending credit to the company.

Messrs. Gilger & Harrison, for appellant:

Combs v. Cooper, 5 Minn. 254 (Gil. 200), expressly holds that there must have been an express design that the act or statement should influence the conduct of another in estoppels by representations, and the court clearly distinguishes between such cases as Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417, and the class of cases to which the case at bar belongs.

Messrs. Hubachek & Daly, for respondent:

If a man so conduct himself, whether intentionally or not, that a reasonable person would infer that a certain state of things exists, and acts on that inference, he shall afterwards be estopped from denying it.

Manufacturers & T. Bank v. Hazard, 80 N. Y. 226; Blair v. Watt, 69 N. Y. 118; McCraey v. Remson, 19 Ala. 480; Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 480; Brown v. Grant, 39 Minn. 404.

Negligence when naturally tending to indi-former and his declarations. Burke v. Grant, 2 West. Rep. 864, 116 Ill. 124; Hefner v. Vandolah, 57 Ill. 520; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. ed. 618; Faxton v. Faxton, 28 Mich. 159; Tucker v. Conwell, 67 Ill. 552.

To constitute an estoppel in pais, (1) there must have been a false representation or a concealment of material facts; (2) the party to whom the representation was made, or from whom the material facts were concealed, must have been ignorant of the existence of the facts concealed or of the falsity of the representation. Steed v. Petty, 65 Tex. 480.

It is not created unless the declaration is plainly inconsistent with the rights which are alleged to be barred, and made with full knowledge of the existence of the inconsistent right. Fletcher v. McGill, 8 West. Rep. 532, 110 Ind. 395; Lee v. Templeton, 73 Ind. 315.

No estoppel in pais can arise unless to permit the party sought to be estopped to show the truth will operate as a fraud upon the other party. St. Paul & D. R. Co. v. Blackmar, 44 Minn. 514.

Neither married women nor infants are estopped in pais unless their conduct has been intentional and fraudulent. Sneed v. Petty, supra.

But a husband who holds himself out as a partner with his wife, and induces others to trust the partnership, is estopped to deny its existence. Schlapback v. Long, 90 Ala. 125. See note to Brookhaven v. Smith (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 755.

False representations.

If the declarations or conduct were intended to deceive generally, or occurred under circumstances likely to deceive, it is sufficient. Horn v. Cole, 51 N. H. 297, 12 Am. Rep. 124. See Adams v. Brown, 16 Ohio St. 78; Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 221; Quirk v. Thomas, 6 Mich. 76; Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204.

The representation must generally be the statement of a fact; when not resolvable into a statement of fact as distinguished from a statement of law, the party making it is not bound. Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co. 28 W. Va. 639.

If the element of fraud is wanting, there is no estoppel; as, where both parties are equally cognizant of the facts, and the declarations or silence of the one party produced no change in the conduct of the other, he acting solely on his own judgment. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Amerman, 7 West. Rep. 715, 119 Ill. 329; Davidson v. Young, 38 Ill. 152.

There is no estoppel where parties have the same knowledge of the material facts. Wolf v. Zimmerman, 27 Ind. 488. See Dodge v. Pope, 93 Ind. 488; Krug v. Davis, 101 Ind. 75.

A representation, in order to estop, must be as to facts, either present or past; and a promise to do something in future may constitute a valid contract, but not an estoppel. Jones v. Parker, 67 Tex. 78; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mowry, 96 U. S. 544, 24 L. ed. 674; Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co. supra; Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 618.

The only case in which a representation as to the future can operate as an estoppel is when it is in relation to an intended abandonment of an existing right, and is made to influence others, and they have been induced by it to act. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mowry, supra. See Faxton v. Faxton, 28 Mich. 159; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. ed. 618.

Representations set up as an estoppel must have been made to the party asserting the estoppel, or have been of such a character and made under such circumstances that the party making them must be taken to have contemplated that they would be communicated to and acted on by him. Hodge v. Ludlum, 45 Minn. 280.

It is essential to an estoppel by conduct that there must have been a false representation or concealment of material facts; and a mistake of law made by the party asserting the estoppel, for which the other party was not responsible, is not sufficient. St. Louis v. Schulenburg-Boeckler Lumber Co. 96 Mo. 618.

No one can base an estoppel upon an act of the opposite party induced by his own fraud. McMartin v. Continental Ins. Co. 41 Minn. 198.

Representation must have been acted upon.

A representation, to create an estoppel, must have been acted upon. Hope Lumber Co. v. Foster & L. Hardware Co. 53 Ark. 198; Stuart v. Lowry, 42 Minn. 473.

No representations will authorize or constitute an estoppel, where the party to whom they were made did not act upon them, even if all the other elements which constitute an estoppel exist. Huntington First Nat. Bank v. Williams, 126 Ind. 423.

To work an estoppel the person estopped must have known the facts, or been guilty of negligence in not knowing them, and the persons in whose behalf the doctrine is invoked must have relied on and acted on the faith of what the former said or did or omitted. Weish v. Cooley, 44 Minn. 448.

Parties who made false representations under the assumption that they were true are estopped to say that they were uninformed as to their truthfulness. Ross v. Hobson (Ind.) Feb. 5, 1891.

An estoppel in pais can never operate to prejudice the rights of the person estopped, except when the sole deed of such person would have a similar operative effect. Henry v. Sneed, 99 Mo. 407; Mueller v. Kaessmann, 84 Mo. 318.

cate intention, will have the same effect in creating an estoppel as actual intention.

Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417.

Representations made to mercantile agencies may be taken advantage of and work as an estoppel in favor of any subscriber to whom the representations are carried.

Ibid.; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. p. 597, note 3; Swift v. Winterbotham, L. R. 8 Q. B. 244.

Gillilan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts found by the court below are sufficient to create an equitable estoppel against defendant as to the ownership of the concern doing business as the "New York Pic Company." To raise such an estoppel, it is not necessary that the representations should have been made with actual fraudulent intent. If he knows, or ought to know, the truth, and they are intentionally made under such circumstances as show that the party making them intended, or might reasonably have anticipated, that the party to whom they are made, or to whom they are to be communicated, will rely and act on them as true, and the latter has so relied and acted on them, so that to permit the former to deny their truth will operate as a fraud, the former is, in order to prevent the fraud, estopped to deny their truth. Coleman v. Pearce, 26 Minn. 123; Beebe v. Wilkinson, 30 Minn. 548.

Nor need the representations be made directly to the party acting on them. It is enough if they were made to another, and intended or expected to be communicated as the representations of the party making them to the party acting on them, for him to rely and act on. "The representation may be intended for a particular individual alone, or for several, or for the public, or for any one of a particular class, or it may be made to A, to be communicated to B. Anyone so intended by the party making the representation will be entitled to relief or redress against him, by acting on the representation to his damage." Bigelow, Frauds, 445.

If one act on a representation not made to nor intended for him, he will do so at his own risk. An instance of a right to act on a representation not made directly to the person acting on it, but intended for him, if he had occasion to act on it, is furnished by Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417. The representations a business man makes to a bank or commercial agency, especially to the latter, relating to his business or to his pecuniary responsibility, are among those expected to be communicated to others for them to act on. The business of a commercial agency is to get such information as it can relative to the business and pecuniary ability of business men and business concerns, and communicate it to such of its patrons as may have occasion to apply for it. Anyone making representations to such an agency, relating to his business or the business of any concern with which he is connected, must know, must be held to intend, that whatever he so represents will be communicated by the agent to any patron who may have occasion to inquire. His representations are intended as much for the patrons of the agency, and for them to act on, as for the agency itself. When the representations so made are communicated, as those of the person making them, to a patron of the agency, and he relies and acts on them, he is in position to claim an estoppel. The findings of fact in the case are fully sustained by the evidence.

Order affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled June 25, 1891.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

A. HEILIGMANN, Appt.,
v.

William ROSE et al.

(....Tex....)

1. Criminal acts need not be proved, in a civil action, by any greater or more certain degree of proof than is required in civil actions generally.

2. An instruction which fails to present separately the elements of actual and exemplary damages, but limits the amount of recovery, is not prejudicial in the absence of special requests, if the verdict is for less than the jury could properly find.

NOTE.—Nature and scope of the judge's charge.

No instructions should be given, which are not relevant to facts which there is evidence tending to prove. In many cases, the giving of instructions has been held error. Glat v. Loring, 60 Mo. 487; Huffman v. Ackley, 34 Mo. 277; Lillis v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 64 Mo. 464; Krech v. Pacific Railroad, 64 Mo. 172; Weiland v. Weyland, 64 Mo. 168.

It should be borne in mind in this connection that an appellate court will never reverse a decision on the sole ground that the trial court refused to instruct the jury upon an issue of fact which was not raised by the pleadings and in support of which no evidence has been elicited. State v. Harris, 59 Mo. 550; Barr v. Armstrong, 56 Mo. 577; Winters v. Hannibal & S. J. R. Co. 39 Mo. 498; Hamilton v. Russell, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 309, 2 L. ed. 118; Chirac v. Reinecker, 27 U. 3. A verdict need not specify whether it is for actual or exemplary damages where the issues of actual and exemplary damages are not separately submitted to the jury.

4. Evidence of the market value of dogs is not necessary to sustain a judgment for damages for poisoning them, where there is proof of their usefulness and services from which the jury can infer value.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Bexar County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of plaintiffs dogs, which were alleged to have been poisoned by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the commissioner's opinion.

Conner v. State, 4 Yerg. 187; Allen v. Wanamaker, 81 N. J. L. 370; New York v. Price, 5 Sandf. 542; Rice, Ev. 793-797.

In the absence of statute to the contrary, the judge has power to instruct the jury sua sponte; but it is in his discretion whether to do so or not, if either party request it. Pennook v. Dialogue, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 1. 15, 7 L. ed. 327, 332, affirming 4 Wash. C. C. 538; Haupt v. Pohlmann, 16 Abb. Fr. 301, 307.

State laws prescribing the manner in which the judge shall discharge his duty in charging the jury, or the papers which he will permit to go to them in their retirement, or requiring the jury to answer special interrogatories in addition to their general verdict, do not apply to the courts of the United States. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. ed. 898; Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 429, 23 L. ed. 236; United States v. Train, 12 Fed. Rep. 852. For these regulations the local statutes should be consulted.

In the absence of any regulation requiring it, the judge's instructions need not be reduced to writing, except to the extent necessary for enabling counsel to except. Smith v. Crichton, 33 Md. 103, 108.

Instructions based upon a hypothetical state of facts.

A party has a right to submit a question of law arising on undisputed facts or upon a hypothetical statement within the scope of the evidence, and have the instruction of the court given to the jury thereon; and it is error to refuse to listen to a timely request so to do. Chapman v. McCormick, 86 N. Y. 479.

In order to justify him in giving an instruction predicated upon a supposed state of facts, it is not necessary that he should be entirely satisfied of the existence of such facts, but if there is any evidence from which the jury may infer them to be true, it is his duty to declare the law thereon. Flournoy v. Andrews, 5 Mo. 513; Bradford v. Pearson, 12 Mo. 71.

And it is not error for him to do so, even where the evidence is very slight. Camp v. Phillips, 42 Ga. 239.

He ought not, however, to give instructions upon trifling and indifferent statements irrelevant to the issue (Dickerson v. Johnson, 24 Ark. 251); nor leave a fact to the jury based upon evidence which goes no further than to raise a mere guess, possibility or conjecture as to the truth of what is claimed. Cobb v. Fogelman, 1 Fred. L. 440; Sutton v. Madre, 2 Jones, L. 320.

The judge opens any hypothetical statement with the formal words, "If the jury believe from the evidence." To use only the words, "If the jury believe," without conveying to their minds

Mr. Oscar Bergstrom, for appellant:

It is error for the court to suggest the amount or limit of damages which the jury might find.

Newman v. Dodson, 61 Tex. 91.

Damages are intended as compensation for the pecuniary injury sustained by the party injured, and in order to entitle a party to damages he must show that he has suffered some personal injury or pecuniary loss.

Brown v. Hoburger, 52 Barb. 15; Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354; Cantling v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 54 Mo. 385; Sutherland, Dam. p. 802.

In the absence of testimony, authorizing the finding of actual damages, it is error to submit to the jury a charge authorizing them to find both actual and exemplary damages, without requiring them to find actual and exemplary damages separately, so as to ascertain whether that they are to found their belief on the evidence, is an objectionable way of giving an instruction. Matthews v. Hamilton, 23 Ill. 470; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Ingraham, 77 Ill. 809.

But, as juries are supposed to have some small trace of sense, there is a presumption that they know that they are to find from the evidence, and accordingly it is not necessary to repeat this expression at every turn in the charge. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Ingraham, supra; Miller v. Balthaser, 73 Ill. 302. See Thompson, Charging the Jury, § 82.

A hypothetical instruction which announces a correct legal proposition, and is based on the evidence before the jury, is not liable to the objection that it assumes a fact in dispute. Bushnell v. Crooke Min. & S. Co. 12 Colo. 247.

When counsel should request the court to charge.

The usual course upon a trial is to hand up the requests to the judge before the charge is made, and, at most, prior to the time when the jury are ready to retire in charge of an officer. A proper degree of vigilance would certainly require that the right to present requests should be exercised before the latter contingency, and a delay beyond this ordinarily would leave it for the judge to say whether he would keep or call the jury back and pass upon the requests. Chapman v. McCormick, 86 N. Y. 479.

But notwithstanding such a limit of time, counsel acting in good faith have a right, after the judge has instructed the jury, and before they have retired, to request him to correct an error or supply a deficiency. Crippen v. Hope, 38 Mich. 344; Chapman v. McCormick, supra.

Good practice requires that counsel desiring to request instructions should present their requests to the judge in separate and distinct propositions, fairly and legibly written, before the judge begins his charge. If the presentation of requests is delayed until after the judge has charged the jury, he may not unreasonably require them to be presented orally, or by reading them, he responding to each as read, or he may, in his discretion, require them to be submitted to the adverse counsel, and then charge those that are consented to, and determine whether or not to charge those that are not consented to. Abb. Tr. Fr. 145.

Where, after a cause has been submitted to the jury, they desire further instructions, the court may give them such instructions publicly and in open court, notwithstanding counsel for one of the parties is not present. Cornish v. Graff, 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 204; Rice, Colo. Code Proc. § 187, and cases cited.

the verdict found by the jury is for actual or exemplary damages.

Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Dunlavy, 56 Tex. 256; Wallace v. Finberg, 46 Tex. 85; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. LeGierse, 51 Tex. 208.

Mr. J. M. Copeland for appellees.

Fisher, J., filed the following opinion:

This case originated in the justice court, and was tried on appeal in the District Court of Bexar County at its February Term, 1889, when judgment was rendered in appellees' favor against appellant for the sum of $75 and costs of suit. No written pleadings are in court, except a statement of appellees' demand, wherein they charge that appellant wickedly and maliciously poisoned five dogs, for which they ask a recovery of damages against appellant in the sum of $25 for each of said dogs as actual damages, and $75 exemplary damages. Appellant assigns as error the refusal of the court to instruct the jury upon his request: "You are further instructed that the claim of plaintiffs is based upon acts which, if true, would constitute a criminal offense; and, before you can find for the plaintiffs, you must find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant poisoned the dogs sued for; and, if there is any reasonable hypothesis upon which this poisoning can be explained, except that the defendant did it or that some other person than defendant might have poisoned them, then you will find for defendant." We know of no decision, and none is cited, that would justify the court in giving this charge. There is no force in the position that, because the facts of this case may involve a criminal act, there should be a greater or more certain degree of proof than is required in other civil actions. A party holding the affirmative of an issue is only required to adduce a preponderance of evidence as will satisfy the minds of the jury of the truth of the facts in issue. As said by the court in the case of Sparks v. Dawson, 47 Tex. 145: "To require the facts to be established by evidence with that absolute certainty which fixes in the mind of the jury a conviction that excludes all reasonable doubts of their existence is a rule not applicable to this or any other civil case." The court did not err in refusing to give the charge.

The second assignment presented by appellant affirms that the court erred in the third subdivision of its charge, because the jury was authorized to find a verdict against defendant for exemplary damages, and suggests to them that the court believes the sum of $75 is a proper amount therefor. The charge complained of reads: "If you find from the evidence that defendant intentionally and willfully poisoned the dogs of plaintiffs as charged, or any one of said dogs, you will find a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the actual market value of the dog or dogs so poisoned, and you will, in addition, find a verdict for such exemplary damages as you may deem adequate, not exceeding seventy-five dollars. If, however, you find the charge of plaintiffs not proven, you will find for the defendant." In this connection, the court, at the request of appellant, gave the following in charge first: "In order for the plaintiffs to recover, you must find from the testimony that the defendant poisoned the dogs, and that they were the property of plaintiffs; that the dogs were of some pecuniary value,—either that they had some market value at which they would sell, or that the services or use of the dogs were of some pecuniary value. The simple opinion of a witness, not based upon any facts, as to market value or use of the dogs, is not sufficient." The court does not present the two elements of damages separately, but submits them in one general charge, and restricts the jury in their finding not exceeding a certain amount. In both particulars, our courts have repeatedly deprecated this practice; but, while this is true, the decisions uniformly hold, in the absence of a special charge correcting the error, that it alone is not sufficient cause for reversal. Newman v. Dodson, 61 Tex. 98; Brunswick v. White, 70 Tex. 513; East Line & R. Co. v. Lee, 71 Tex. 541; Brooke v. Clark, 57 Tex. 109; Belo v. Wren, 63 Tex. 727; Moehring v. Hall, 66 Tex. 241. If the verdict of the jury is for a less amount than they could properly find, under the evidence and pleadings, an instruction that informs them that they cannot exceed a certain amount could result in no injury, and is harmless error. East Line & R. Co. v. Lee, 71 Tex. 541. The assignment is not well taken.

Appellant insists by his fourth assignment of error that the verdict of the jury is insufficient to support the judgment, because it does not specify whether they find actual or exemplary damages, or both, or how much of either. If the rule that the court is not required to submit the issues of actual and exemplary damages separately is correct, unless requested so to do, it would be inconsistent to require the jury to make separate findings upon issues not submitted. This assignment is governed by the rule discussed under the one preceding.

The appellant's third assignment questions the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury, on the ground that the dogs poisoned were of no market or pecuniary value, or that their service or use was of value to the owners. Considering the evidence under this assignment, we find that appellees lost these valuable dogs by poison, such dogs at the time their property. The evidence that connects the appellant with the killing of the dogs is partially circumstantial, but we think sufficient to show his guilty agency, and that the trespass was intentional and malicious. The dogs were of fine breed, and well trained, and one of the Newfoundland dogs was trained to signal the arrival of any person at appellee's, who could tell from his look if the person was man, woman, or child. The dogs, so testifies appellee, are worth $25 each, and she would not take double that sum. Her husband paid $5 for one when young, and one was given in pay for professional services rendered by appellee; and she could have sold the dogs for $5 each, but would not take $50 each for them. Great pains were taken in raising them, and they were well trained.

The authorities well settle that dogs are property, and that an owner has his action and remedy against a trespasser for the damages resulting from injuries inflicted upon them. Some authorities hold that dogs have no market value. This may be relatively true, but it is not a rule that will govern in all cases. It may be difficult, in the majority of cases, to ascertain the market value of a dog, but such a result may, in some cases, be accomplished. The special charge asked by appellant, and given by the court, substantially presents the true rule in determining the value of dogs. It may be either a market value, if the dog has any, or some special or pecuniary value to the owner, that may be ascertained by reference to the usefulness and services of the dog. Ramsey v. Hurley, 72 Tex. 200; Brunsvig v. White, 70 Tex. 504; Uhlein v. Cromack, 109 Mass. 278; Brent v. Kimball, 60 Ill. 213; Perry v. Phipps, 10 Ired. L. 261; Parker v. Mize, 27 Ala. 488; Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 488; Canling v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 54 Mo. 886; Spray v. Ammerman, 66 Ill. 818; Stickney v. Allen, 10 Gray, 355.

The law recognizes a property in dogs, and for a trespass and infraction of this right the law gives the owner his remedy. The wrong-doer cannot escape the consequences of his acts by saying, "You have suffered no damages," for the law implies that some damages result from every illegal trespass or invasion of another's rights. Parker v. Mize and Brent v. Kimball, supra; Champion v. Vincent, 20 Tex. 816.

There is no evidence in this case that the dogs had a market value, but the evidence is ample showing the usefulness and services of the dogs, and that they were of special value to the owner. If the jury from the evidence should be satisfied that the dogs were serviceable and useful to the owner, they could infer their value when the owner, by evidence, fixes some amount upon which they could form a basis. We cannot say that the verdict in this case is not based upon actual damages, and when the evidence, as it does in this case, justifies a verdict for either actual or exemplary damages, or both, we will not presume that the finding of the jury was based on grounds not proper.

We find no error in the record, and report the case for affirmance.

Adopted by Supreme Court, May 26, 1891.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

James Seth ADAMS
v.
Anne T. ADAMS et al.

(....Mass.....)

1. A statute providing that a child born before wedlock shall be made legiti-mate by the subsequent marriage of its parents will not legitimate a child whose father had not at the time of the marriage obtained a valid divorce from his former wife.

2. The status given a man by the laws of his domicile will not be recognized in other jurisdictions when it is constructed on principles contrary to those generally recognized

NOTE.—Effect of subsequent marriage of the parents on antenuptial issue.

The general current of authority favors the doctrine that where an illegitimate child has been legitimated by the subsequent marriage of its parents according to the laws of the State or country where the marriage takes place, and the parents are domiciled, such legitimacy follows the child wherever it may go. Miller v. Miller, 91 N. Y. 315.

Each State has the right to determine the status of its own citizens; the domicile decides which State has the right. Strader v. Graham, 51 U. S. 10 How. 98, 18 L. ed. 342; Story, Conf. L. 141, § 106.

Foreign jurists generally maintain that the question of legitimacy or illegitimacy is to be decided exclusively by the law of the domicile of origin. Story, Conf. L. § 98.

It seems admitted by foreign jurists, that as the validity of the marriage must depend upon the law of the country where it is celebrated, the status or condition of the offspring, as to legitimacy or illegitimacy, ought to depend on the same law, so that if by the law of the place of the marriage the offspring, although born before marriage, would be legitimate, they ought to be deemed legitimate in every other country for all purposes whatever, including heirship of immovable property. Story, Conf. L. § 98.

Legitimacy or illegitimacy are among universal personal qualifications, and the laws of the State affecting all these personal qualities of its subjects travel with them wherever they go and attach to 13 L. R. A.

them in whatever country they may be resident. Wheaton, Law of Nations, 172.

When an illegitimate child has, by the subsequent marriage of his parents, become legitimate by virtue of the laws of the State or country where such marriage took place, and the parents were domiciled, it is therefore legitimate everywhere, and entitled to all the rights flowing from that status, including the right to inherit. Miller v. Miller, supra.

In cases of intestacy personal property is distributed according to the law of the place of the domicile of the intestate. Parsons v. Lyman, 20 N. Y. 103, 112; Moultrie v. Hunt, 23 N. Y. 394; Story, Conf. L. § 380.

But real estate in such cases descends according to the law of the place where it is situated. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144-159; Story, Conf. L. § 424.

In this case it was held that an antenuptial child born in Scotland, or persons domiciled there, could not inherit lands in England, though by the law of Scotland the child had been legitimated by the subsequent intermarriage of the parents. The rule laid down in this case has been uniformly followed in England. Don's Estate, 4 Drew. 197; Re Wright, 2 Kay & J. 595; Re Wilson's Trusts, L. R. 1 Eq. Cas. 247; Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55.

An antenuptial child was born in South Carolina, in which State the parents intermarried, but at that time their intermarriage did not legitimate the child. Subsequently, the three became citizens of Mississippi, where antenuptial children were legitimated by the subsequent intermarriage of the or to those which can be admitted by the laws of the forum.

3. That a marriage has taken place on the faith of a previous divorce does not preclude an inquiry by the courts of another State into the capacity of the divorced party and thus into the validity of the divorce, and the marriage may be declared invalid if the divorce is one which would be decreed void if directly in issue.
4. A decree of divorce will be regarded as void in other jurisdictions if granted by a court which was without authority because plaintiff had not resided within its jurisdiction the length of time fixed by statute as a condition precedent to his right to sue; and it may be impeached collaterally in such other jurisdictions by strangers to it notwithstanding the divorce record shows that the necessary residence was found as a fact by the court.
5. A divorce decree which would be regarded as invalid outside of the jurisdiction in which it was passed should not be regarded as beyond impeachment in that jurisdiction.
6. A child whose parents were married after its birth and after its father had obtained a divorce from his former wife, which was void as against his children by her because of lack of power in the court to grant it, cannot compete with the latter for an interest under a Massachusetts will giving a benefit to "all the children" of its father.
7. Statutes providing that the issue of marriages null in law shall be legitimate, and that when a marriage is annulled on the ground that a former husband or wife was living, children begotten before the judgment are legitimate, apply only to children born after the void ceremony was performed.

parents. The father died intestate. It was held that the status of the child was fixed by the domicile of its origin; where it was illegitimate, it so remained, and could not inherit. Smith v. Kelley, 23 Miss. 167.

A child born in Scotland, of parents domiciled there, who at the time of his birth were not married, but who afterwards intermarried in Scotland (there being no lawful impediment to their marriage, either at the time of the birth or afterwards), though legitimate by the law of Scotland, cannot take, as heir, lands of his father in England. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 7 Clark & F. 885.

The English judges, in Doe v. Vardill, 5 Barn. & C. 438, did not deny, but admitted, that the effect of the Scotch marriage in that case was to legitimize the previous born issue, and that, being legitimate in Scotland, the country of his domicile, he was also legitimate in England. But they held, as before stated, that a person who inherits land in England must not only be legitimate, but must have been actually born in wedlock. Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 252-254; Miller v. Miller, 91 N. Y. 321, 322.

In addition to the cases cited in Ross v. Ross and Miller v. Miller, supra, and in the notes to Stewart v. Stewart, 31 N. J. Eq. 407, and to Bussom v. Forsyth, 32 N. J. Eq. 285, a few recent cases are appended; Atkinson v. Anderson, L. R. 21 Ch. Div. 100; Re Grove, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 216; Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 28; *Stoltz v. A. 488, 45 N. J. Eq. 603, note.

The question involved was elaborately discussed in England, in Doe v. Vardill, 5 Barn. & C. 438, sub nom. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 2 Clark & F. 571, 7 Clark & F. 895; in New York, in Miller v. Miller, 13 L. R. A.

(September 2, 1891.)

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk for the consideration of the full court of a suit brought to establish an alleged right to share in the fund left by the will of Seth Adams, deceased. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. F. Dickenson, Jr., and Hollis R. Bailey, for plaintiff:

The status of an infant (born before wedlock) as to legitimacy is determined by the law of the domicile of his father at the date of the act of legitimation, or possibly by the law of the father's domicile at the date of birth and legitimation.

If legitimate according to that law, he will be considered as legitimate in Massachusetts, and will be entitled to take under a Massachusetts will.

The language of the statute is mandatory and unqualified, and applies to all children born before wedlock without regard to the question whether or not the parents at the time supra; and in Massachusetts, in Ross v. Ross, supra. In the latter case Chief Justice Gray cites and comments upon every case up to that date (1880), and, after an exhaustive discussion of the whole subject, comes to the conclusion that the particular reasons that influenced the English court in holding, in Doe v. Vardill, that an heir to land in England must be actually born in wedlock, do not apply in this country, and that a person declared to be a legitimate child of another, by the law of the State of the domicile, must be held to have all the rights of a legitimate child wherever he goes.

An examination of these cases will show that the contrary result in England was attempted to be justified by the language of the Statute, so-called, of Merton, 20 Hen. III. chap. 9, which, it was claimed, negatively enacted that the English heir must be born in lawful wedlock. Lord Brougham, in 2 Clark & F. 582, and again, in 7 Clark & F. 914, combats this position with arguments that the courts of New York and Massachusetts seemed to think unanswerable. Dayton v. Adkisson, 4 L. R. A. 488, 45 N. J. Eq. 603.

The relation of husband and wife being a status based upon the contract of the parties, and recognized by all Christian nations, the validity of that contract, if not polygamous, nor incestuous, is governed by the law of the place of the contract; this status, once legally established, should be recognized everywhere as fully as if created by the law of the domicile; and therefore any such marriage, valid by the law of the place where it is contracted, is valid everywhere to all intents and effects, civil or criminal, including the settlement of the wife and children, her right of dower, and their legitimacy and capacity to inherit the father's real estate. *Parsons, Ch. The competency of a party to marry is to be determined by the law of the State where the marriage takes place.

Under the provisions of the celebrated "Code Napoleon," enacted in 1804, and substantially adopted in many of the American States, humane regulations as to legitimacy will be found established. No. 331 is in the following language:

Children born out of wedlock, other than such as are the fruit of an incestuous or adulterous intercourse, may be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their father and mother, whenever the latter shall have legally acknowledged them before their marriage, or shall have recognized them in the act itself of celebration. The germ of this enactment dates back to the Roman law.

A natural son born of a free woman, with whom marriage is not prohibited, will become subject to the power of the father as soon as the marriage instruments are drawn as the Constitution directs; which allows the same benefit to those who are born before marriage as to those who are born subsequent thereto. Cooper, Justin. De Legitimatione, lib. 1, title 10, § 13.

A charge of illegitimacy must be supported by direct and irrefutable evidence. It must be conclusively proved. Caujolle v. Ferrie, 23 N. Y. 90.

As to a marriage at common law, and the evidence tending to prove it, see Hebblethwaite v. Hepworth, 88 Ill. 132; Port v. Port, 70 Ill. 436; Caujolle v. Ferrie, 23 N. Y. 107; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 462; 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 13, 457, note, 1521; Stoltz v. Doering, 112 Ill. 234.

The law is unwilling to bastardize children, and throws the proof on the party who alleges illegitimacy; and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a child, eo nomine, is therefore a legitimate 13 L. R. A.

By the law of California and of Texas where a marriage is annulled or is deemed null, children begotten before the judgment are legitimate, whether born before or after wedlock. If entered into in good faith by either of the parties, the marriage, so far as children are concerned, has all the effects of a valid marriage.

In Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 145, Lord Chancellor Erskine said, in reference to proof of an actual marriage, that the evidence, especially in the case of obscure families, must be very slight. As sustaining the same rule, may also be cited Starr v. Peck, 1 Hill, 270; and the qualification of that case, as made in Cheney v. Arnold, 15 N. Y. 345, does not weaken its authority on the question of the duty of a court to presume matrimony, when the parties have cohabited, and there are circumstances from which a contract may be inferred. Caujolle v. Ferrie, 23 N. Y. 90.

At common law a bastard has no right of inheritance. In the eyes of the law, bastards are not regarded as children for civil purposes. 1 Bl. Com. p. 458, in discussing the rights of bastards, says: "The rights are very few, being only such as he can acquire, for he can inherit nothing, being the son of nobody, and sometimes called filius nullius, sometimes filius populi. In Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, it was held that the common-law rule which excluded illegitimate children from inheriting was in force in that State.

Words and terms having a precise and well-settled meaning in the jurisprudence of a country are to be understood in the same sense when used in its statutes, unless a different meaning is unmistakably intended. The word "illegitimate," when used in this connection, has, by the common law, and the law of this State, a well-defined meaning, which is, begotten and born out of wedlock. 1 Rev. Stat. 641, § 1; 2 Kent, Com. 208, 209; 1 Bl. Com. 454, 455.

of remark, that the famous Statute of Merton, 20 Hen. III. chap. 9, is, in fact, not a statute, but a mere entry on the minutes of Parliament of a refusal by the English lords to assimilate the laws of England to that of other civilized countries, by affirmatively declaring that the marriage of the parents subsequent to the birth rendered the child legitimate. Dayton v. Adkisson, 4 L. R. A. 438, 45 N. J. Eq. 608.

Before and during the reign of Henry III., if it was alleged that the person claiming as heir was illegitimate, a writ was issued to the archbishop, or bishop, commanding that inquiry and return upon this issue be made to the king or his justices. (1 Reeves, Hist. chap. 3, 168.) By the canons of the church, the rule of the Roman law, the subsequent intermarriage of parents legitimated antenuptial children, and the ecclesiastics were inclined to return according to the canons of their church, and contrary to the common law.

At the Parliament of Merton the ecclesiastics endeavored to enact the rule of their church, but "all the earls and barons, with one voice, answered that they would not change the laws of England which had hitherto been used and approved." (1 Bl. Com. 19, 456; 2 Kent, Com. 209.) No change whatever was made at Merton; and, thereafter, the ecclesiastics were required to return the facts, whether the claimant was begotten and born out of wedlock, and judgment was rendered by the courts according to the common law. 1 Reeves, Hist. chap. 3, 168.

Bracton, an ecclesiastic, as well as lawyer, who wrote, it is supposed, in the time of Henry III., in discussing the effect of the legitimation of antenuptial children by the subsequent intermarriage of their parents, said: "It follows to consider how the illegitimate are legitimated, and it is to be known, that if anyone has natural children by any woman, and afterwards contracts marriage with her, the children already born are legitimated by the subsequent marriage, and are reckoned fit for all lawful acts, nevertheless only for those which regard the sacred ministry, but they are not legitimate for those which regard the realm, nor are they adjudged to be heirs who can succeed to their relatives, on account of a custom of the realm, which is of a contrary import." Chap. 29, f. 63, b. or vol. 1, p. 503, of the Lords Commissioners' Edition. It may be safely asserted that the decisions of the English courts rest on the common law. Fenton v. Livingstone, 5 Jur. N. S. pt. 1, p. 1183, holds that the Statute of Merton is only declaratory of the common law.

But it is not very material whether they rest on the common law or the early statutes, because the English statutes enacted before the settlement of this country are a part of its common law. Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 198, 3 L. ed. 402; 1 Kent, Com. 473.

The question whether Charles W. Adams, when he undertook to marry Hannah Phillips, was married or single, is a question not of law but of fact. That question must be settled by this court, because the case is here, and the question what the California court would do with this question of fact if the case were there, is quite beside the point. The validity of the marriage depends wholly upon the question what view this court shall take concerning the validity of the divorce.

In Boyes v. Bedale, 1 Hem. & M. 798, it was held that a child legitimated by subsequent marriage under the law of France, where the father acquired a domicile after the death of the testator, was not a child within the meaning of the testator's will.

In no case in this State has the law of legitimation of another State different from our own been applied to the construction of a domestic will.

See Cotman v. Krell, 152 Mass. 214; Lincoln v. Perry, 4 L. R. A. 215, 149 Mass. 368.

Even if the California law permitted a man to legitimate a child already born by going through the form of marriage with his mistress, this court would not recognize such legitimation any more than it would recognize the child of a polygamous marriage.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity by which the plaintiff seeks to establish his right to a share in a fund left by the will of Seth Adams of Newton, Massachusetts, to the "present wife" of his brother, Charles W. Adams, "for the benefit of herself and all the children of said Charles in equal proportions." The question is whether the plaintiff is one of the children within the meaning of the will. The wife referred to is admitted to be the defendant, Anne T. Adams, who was married to Charles in Maine, in 1854, he then being a resident of New York. The plaintiff is the child of Charles W. Adams and Hannah Phillips, was born in California on August 28, 1881, and was then illegitimate. At that time Charles Adams' domicile was in Texas. In October, 1881, Charles Adams changed his domicile to California, and on December 3, 1881, he began an action there for divorce against the above-mentioned Anne, and got a decree on April 13, 1882. It is found that he had not been a resident of the State for six months next preceding the commencement of the action, as required by the California Civil Code, § 128, and that for this reason the court had no jurisdiction of the action, but that the court was imposed upon by Adams. We may also mention that it is found that Adams' wife was then residing in Massachusetts, and had no actual notice of the action, and that it might be a question, if material, whether her domicile followed that of her husband. Cal. Civ. Code, § 129;

The principles supposed to be incorporated in the so-called Statute of Merton are fully recognized by special legislation in the following States as summarized by Snyder in his Geography of Marriage, as follows:

In Arizona, the children of a man and woman living together as man and wife, or of persons living together, who subsequently marry, are legitimate.

In Florida, Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Washington, children born out of wedlock become legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents.

In Connecticut, where the parents of children born out of wedlock subsequently marry, and recognize such children as theirs, they shall be deemed legitimate. Stat. 1876.

In Virginia and West Virginia children born out of wedlock, whose parents subsequently marry, if recognized by the father before or after marriage, shall be deemed legitimate.

In New Hampshire, where the parents afterwards marry and recognize them, they shall inherit as if they were legitimate.

In Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Ohio, Vermont, Wisconsin and Wyoming a child born out of wedlock, whose parents shall subsequently marry, and whose father acknowledges such child, shall be deemed legitimate.

In New Mexico, children legitimated by a subsequent marriage of their parents are as direct heirs 18 L. R. A.

as legitimate children, with the exception of the right of primogeniture.

In North Carolina, children born out of wedlock can become legitimate only upon petition of the father, which must be presented to the superior court of the county where he resides, and if it appear that he is father of the child, the court may make a decree to that effect which shall be recorded by the clerk, and such child may then inherit from his father only.

In Michigan, children born out of wedlock become legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents, or, if they do not marry, the father can make the child "legitimate in law" by so acknowledging in writing, executed like a deed of land.

In Nebraska, children born out of wedlock become legitimate if the parents afterwards marry and have been adopted in the family with other children born in wedlock, or shall have been acknowledged by the father in writing, signed in the presence of one witness.

In Louisiana, children born out of wedlock, except those born from an incestuous or adulterous connection, may be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their father and mother, when legally acknowledged before marriage, by an act passed before a notary and two witnesses, or by their contract of marriage itself. They are then known as natural children.

Burien v. Shannon, 115 Mass. 438, 447, 448. On April 20, 1882, Charles Adams married Hannah Phillips in California, then having his domicile there, and after the marriage recognized the plaintiff as his son. By the law of California a child born before wedlock becomes legitimate by the subsequent marriage of his parents. Civil Code, § 215. The law of Texas is similar if the child is recognized by the father. Rev. Stat. § 1656 (1879).

The word "children," in a Massachusetts will means legitimate children. Kent v. Barker, 2 Gray, 535, 536. Probably the meaning would be the same even if the parents referred to, and the child, were domiciled in a State where illegitimate children were recognized as children for some purposes. Lincoln v. Perry, 149 Mass. 368, 373, 374, 4 L. R. A. 215. But we do not need to consider this at length, as it does not appear that the law of California or of Texas would recognize the plaintiff as the child of Charles Adams for the present purposes unless he were legitimated, and Charles Adams in any case was only domiciled in California for a short time, long after the testator's death, and after the birth of his child, and died domiciled in Massachusetts. The plaintiff's case is put wholly upon his having been legitimated. We assume for the purposes of our decision that if he has been legitimated he is entitled to a share under the will. Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257; Sleigh v. Strider, 5 Call, 439; Re Andros, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 637.

We may as well add here that if the Texas domicile of Charles Adams at the time of the birth of his son was material (Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 248, 256; Re Grove, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 216), no difference based on that fact and favorable to the plaintiff has been called to our attention. We shall speak only of the law of California in dealing with this part of the case. We shall not consider whether, if it were necessary to satisfy the requirements of the Texas statute, a marriage in California would do so.

It may be assumed that the California statute to which we have referred (Civil Code, § 215) requires a valid marriage to legitimate an earlier born child. Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257, 263, 269; Greenhow v. James, 80 Va. 636, 641. For Charles Adams' marriage to be valid it was necessary that he should have obtained a valid divorce. But if we should assume that the decree of divorce was valid in California so that Charles Adams had a capacity to marry there, and that his marriage conferred the status of a legitimate child upon his son by the law of that State, we should encounter doubts like those expressed by Lord Colonsay in Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55, 97, whether at any distance of time we were to reopen the inquiry into the circumstances of Charles Adams' resort to the California court. The California record shows that the court there found that Charles Adams had been a resident of the State for the necessary time. There is color in the California decisions put in evidence for the argument that this finding could not be impeached collaterally in California, and thus that the case supposed is the case before us.

Taking the case this way for a moment, we still are unable to decide it in favor of the plaintiff. The rule that the status of the domicile is the status everywhere must yield when the status is constructed on principles which are contrary to those which are generally recognized or which can be admitted by the law of the forum resorted to. See Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243. We should agree with the English decisions so far as this, that the fact that a marriage has taken place on the faith of a previous divorce does not preclude an inquiry by the courts of another State into the capacity of the divorced party and thus into the validity of the divorce, or a denial of the validity of the marriage if the divorce is one which would be decreed void if it were directly in issue. A purely voluntary contract of marriage cannot be allowed to impart a conclusive character to a decree which before could have been examined. Smith v. Smith, 13 Gray, 209, 210; Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55; Shaw v. Atty-Gen. L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 156; Briggs v. Briggs, 5 Prob. Div. 163.

The present case offers remarkably little ground for hesitation in going into this inquiry. Marriage in California is, or may be, a pure matter of private contract entered into without intervention of the State except for purposes of registration. Civil Code, §§ 55, 75, 78; Graham v. Bennet, 2 Cal. 503. The mother's rights are not in question, and if they were, she did not stand at all in the position of a purchaser for value without notice. She is found to have known all the facts, and her belief in Charles Adams' capacity to contract marriage was simply an opinion about California law. (We are not now considering the conditions of a putative marriage, as to which different views have been expressed). Glass v. Glass, 114 Mass. 563, 566; Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55, 97; Buisson's Succession, 41 La. Ann. 217, 220, 221; Harris v. Harris, 85 Ky. 49. The plaintiff is claiming a purely gratuitous benefit as an incidental result of the proceedings in California, at the expense of other children who were not parties to any of those proceedings, or entitled to be heard at any stage of them, but who nevertheless are to be precluded from denying their validity.

If the validity of the divorce were immediately in issue it could be impeached here, for want of jurisdiction, notwithstanding the recitals in the record, and those recitals could be contradicted by parol evidence. Sewall v. Sewall, 122 Mass. 156, 161; Cumington v. Belchertown, 149 Mass. 223, 225, 4 L. R. A. 181; Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897. See Bowler v. Huston, 80 Gratt. 266; Mitchell v. Ferris, 5 Houst. (Del.) 34; Eager v. Stover, 59 Mo. 87. For instance, if Charles Adams had married Hannah Phillips in this State and had been indicted for polygamy (People v. Davell, 25 Mich. 247; Van Fossen v. State, 37 Ohio St. 317, 320. See People v. Baker, 76 N. Y. 78); or even in a proceeding between the parties to the divorce, if the one raising the objection had not appeared in that cause, and was not domiciled in the State where it was granted. Reed v. Reed, 52 Mich. 117, 121; Cross v. Cross, 108 N. Y. 628. See Chaney v. Bryan, 15 Lea, 589; Leith v. Leith, 39 N. H. 20, 41. So a fortiori where the question is raised, as here, by third persons whose rights are concerned, and who were not parties to or entitled to be heard in the divorce suit. See Gregory v. Gregory, 78 Me. 187, 190, 1 New Eng. Rep. 796; Neff v. Beauchamp, 74 Iowa, 92, 94; O'Dea v. O'Dea, 101 N. Y. 23, 1 Cent. Rep. 785; Cumington v. Belchertown, 149 Mass. 223, 4 L. R. A. 131; Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55.

In Hood v. Hood, 11 Allen, 196, the fact of domicile was tried between the original parties for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of an Illinois divorce, and in Hood v. Hood, 110 Mass. 463, it was the Massachusetts, not the Illinois, decree, which was held conclusive on third persons, they offering evidence only to impeach the Illinois decree. See also Burlen v. Shannon, 115 Mass. 438, 445, 449; Pub. Stat. chap. 146, § 41.

There is no doubt that the requirement of six months residence goes to the jurisdiction of the court. The finding of the judge on this point is confirmed, not only by the plain effect of the California statute, but by the express statement of the Supreme Court of that State and by its intimation that a divorce granted without that prerequisite would not be binding in any other State. Bennett v. Bennett, 28 Cal. 599, 601; People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 263, 264.

But although we have made the assumption for a moment, we by no means are prepared to concede that if the present case arose in California under a California will it would be decided differently there. The universal effect of a judgment in rem in establishing or changing a status or title, whether given to it by statute or by the tradition of the courts, rests on the practical necessity of the case, because the effect is of a nature to concern strangers to the proceedings. It would be inconvenient for parties to be divorced as between themselves and yet married towards the world. The same convenience makes it desirable that the effect should be the same wherever the question arises, whether within the jurisdiction or without it, and therefore in the case of a decree which would be void outside the jurisdiction, that it should not be held conclusive within it. The decree, if binding in California, would be binding everywhere. Cheever v. Wilson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 108, 19 L. ed. 604. It is desirable, at least, that the converse rule should be applied, and that a decree void elsewhere should not be held binding there. We are aware that some of the cases which we have cited and others which we have not cited contemplate the possibility of a divorce which shall be valid only as to the plaintiff within the jurisdiction. But especially in this country where changes of residence from State to State are frequent, every court must strive so far as possible to bring the local view of a citizen's status into accord with that which would prevail generally elsewhere.

We have tried to show that the decree before us would be regarded as void outside the jurisdiction, and void on the ground that the condition precedent attached by a California statute to the right of the court to take jurisdiction had not been complied with. The question is whether the statute has a less effect within the State. No conclusive evidence of the law of California upon this point has been called to our attention. If the plaintiff had been rightly in court and the objection had been that the defendant had not been duly served, it may be that if the record showed a proper publication it could not be contradicted. Re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 220. But perhaps even this is doubtful in view of some of the decisions earlier cited, and however it may be, a distinction has been suggested between a total want of jurisdiction and a failure to get jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in a case which is rightly in court. People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 256. See Henderson v. Staniford, 108 Mass. 504, 506; Whitwell v. Barbier, 7 Cal. 54, 63, 64. We feel at liberty to assume the law of California to be in accordance with that generally received elsewhere, and to consider the question on principle. The argument for the conclusiveness of the decree in California would seem to be that the parties to a domestic judgment showing jurisdiction on the face of the record cannot impeach it collaterally. Hendrick v. Whittemore, 105 Mass. 23; McCormick v. Fiske, 138 Mass. 379; Freeman, Judgm. §§181, 184. And that if a judgment in rem is operative as between the parties while it stands, it must be effectual to determine their status as to third persons, although not parties, for reasons already given. Re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 220; Hood v. Hood, 110 Mass. 463, 465; Brigham v. Fayerweather, 140 Mass. 411, 418, 1 New Eng. Rep. 796.

But if the judgment is thus binding to all intents and purposes in California, it would be binding elsewhere, which as has been shown is not the law. In New York this consideration has been adduced as a reason for the rule prevailing there that a domestic record may be impeached collaterally for want of jurisdiction, even by a party. Ferguson v. Crawford, 70 N. Y. 253, 261, 262. Whether the rule as to parties be regarded as an anomaly established on the principle communis error facit jus, or as a mere rule of procedure, that those who have it in their power to reverse a judgment must do so if they do not want to be bound by it, as possibly may be inferred from some of the cases (Hendrick v. Whittemore, 105 Mass. 23, 28), the conclusion cannot be admitted that those who have not that power are also bound, if the judgment is in rem, to admit the change of status which it purports to effect. Consider what would be the result. In a great majority of divorces neither party wishes to disturb the decree. If their acquiescence should be allowed to have the effect supposed, third persons may be affected in their property and in their most sacred personal rights by the interested action of others without ever having had a chance to be heard. The cases are few, and we are aware of no binding authority. But in Perry v. Meddowcroft, 10 Beav. 122, 137, an infant was allowed to impeach a domestic sentence of nullity collaterally for collusion, although the sentence operated in rem, and bastardized him if it stood. Harrison v. Southampton, 22 L. J. N. S. Ch. 372; Meddowcroft v. Huguenin, 4 Moore, P. C. 886, 898. We cannot doubt that if the fraud on the court had concerned its jurisdiction rather than the merits, Lord Langdale would have been at least equally ready to hear the evidence. Cavanaugh v. Smith, 84 Ind. 390. Yet the parties to the collusive decree were bound by it. Greene v. Greene, 2 Gray, 861, 862; Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60, 65. We have confined our citations mainly to cases of divorce and judgments in rem. But where there has been an execution sale under a judgment in personam there is a difficulty not unlike that which arises with regard to judgments in rem in allowing the validity of the judgment to be disputed by third persons for the purpose of destroying the purchaser's title. Yet it has been held that this may be done. Safford v. Weare, 142 Mass. 281, 2 New Eng. Rep. 586.

We shall not consider further whether this judgment was not absolutely void on the facts reported, and whether, if so, the record could be contradicted by the parties to it on what has been declared in California to be a "fundamental rule that no court can acquire jurisdiction by the mere assertion of it, or by deciding that it has it." McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300, 314.

We are of opinion, for the reasons which we have given, that the validity of the divorce granted Charles W. Adams is open to contradiction in this suit, that the divorce was void and ineffectual as against his legitimate children, that therefore his marriage with the plaintiff's mother was void, and did not legitimate the plaintiff in such a sense as to entitle him to set up a claim in competition with the legitimate children under a Massachusetts will.

Another and distinct argument has been drawn from another California statute which provides that when a marriage is annulled on the ground that a former husband or wife was living, children begotten before the judgment are legitimate. Cal. Civ. Code, § 84. The California and Texas statutes also provide that the issue of marriages null in law shall be legitimate. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1387; Tex. Rev. Stat. § 1656.

The Texas statute may be laid on one side. For even if we should hold that the Texas law imparted to the plaintiff his capacity for legitimation, which under the facts of this case we do not intimate, still, subject to the qualifications heretofore stated, the effects of his parents' marriage upon him must be determined by the law of California where it took place and where they and he then were domiciled. We lay on one side, therefore, without further remark, a dictum in a decision by the Supreme Court of Texas, that children born before the parents entered into a void marriage would be legitimated so as to take as children under a Texas will. Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 731, 745, 746.

We see no ground for construing the California Acts as applying to any children except those born after the void ceremony has been gone through with. They alone can be described as issue of the marriage, according to the express words of section 1387. Greenhow v. James, 80 Va. 636, 638. They alone fall within the obvious reasons for the Statute and the earlier Spanish law from which it would seem that the Statute may have been derived, according to the exposition in another Texas case. Smith v. Smith, 1 Tex. 621, 629. If we assume that section 84 applies where there has been no judgment annulling the marriage, the general words "children begotten before the judgment" must be confined to children born after the marriage in view of section 1387. Neither section 84, nor section 1387, nor both together, can be taken to enlarge the meaning of section 215, discussed at the beginning of this opinion, so that a void marriage shall legitimate children previously born. The view which we take seems to be that of the Supreme Court of California so far as they have expressed an opinion. Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484, 491. See also Watts v. Owens, 62 Wis. 512, 517; Fraser, Parent & Child, 2d ed. 28. We have found no case favoring a different construction except the few words in Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 746.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Hallowell, Hume & Gordon for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John E. Lydecker and Douthitt, Jones & Mason, for William S. Grosvenor, defendant in error:

The State has a right to regulate by statute the manner any right, title or interest in and to real estate situated within the State of Kansas may be transferred; and whether the wife be an heir of the husband under the Statute, or not, when she survive him she cannot take any interest in real estate transferred to a purchaser in manner and form prescribed by the laws of the State; and provisions of the Statute prescribing certain modes of transfer, which will transfer the entire estate without the wife's joining therein, cannot properly be called provisions as to the descent of property; there is no descent.

The right of the wife to an interest in the real estate of the husband is contingent, and is not a vested or existing right, such that the Legislature may not at any time modify, change, or entirely abolish.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Martha A. Buffington brought two actions in the District Court of Kingman County, one against William S. Grosvenor and the other against John G. Sears, to recover from each one half of certain real property situate in Kingman County. She was unsuccessful in each case, and is here complaining of the judgments that were given. The material facts of the cases are alike, and, as they present but one question, they may be disposed of in a single opinion. Martha A. Buffington became the wife of Pierce Buffington in 1865, and continued in that relation until the time of his death, in 1884. He removed to Kansas five or six years before his death and, shortly after coming here, he acquired the absolute legal title to the property in controversy. Afterwards he conveyed the property by warranty deeds to certain grantees, and the defendants, by subsequent conveyances, have acquired all the title obtained by such grantees. Martha A. Buffington did not join her husband in conveying the property, and has never executed a conveyance of the same to anyone, but she was never a resident or citizen of Kansas, and was never in the State prior to the death of her husband. She now claims to be entitled to one-half interest in the real estate of her husband, of which she had made no conveyance; but the trial court held, under the proviso of section 8 of the Act concerning descents and distributions, that, as she had not been a resident of Kansas, she never had any interest in the land conveyed, and her signature or conveyance was unnecessary to a complete transfer of the land by her husband. The section referred to reads as follows: "One half in value of all the real estate in which the husband, at any time during the marriage, had a legal was a domiciled inhabitant at the time of his death, without regard to the place of either the birth or death, or the situation of the property at the time; but that real estate descends according to the law of the place where it is situated. Lingen v. Lingen, 45 Ala. 410, 412; Woerner, American Law of Administration, § 64.

For the minor details of the law regulating the descent of real property, the practitioner should consult the statutory regulation of the various States. Mr. Washburn, in his well-known treatise on the Law of Real Property (pp. 21 et seq. vol. 3), has appropriately grouped the various rules of descent that at present obtain in the various jurisdictions of the United States.

or equitable interest which has not been sold on execution or other judicial sale, and not necessary for the payment of debts, and of which the wife has made no conveyance, shall, under the direction of the probate court, be set apart by the executor as her property, in fee simple, upon the death of the husband, if she survives him: provided, that the wife shall not be entitled to any interest, under the provisions of this section, in any land to which the husband has made a conveyance, when the wife, at the time of the conveyance, is not or never has been a resident of this State. Continuous cohabitation as husband and wife is presumptive evidence of marriage, for the purpose of giving the right aforesaid." Gen. Stat. 1889, par. 2599. The plaintiff's contention is that the proviso of the section violates both the State and Federal Constitutions, in that it discriminates against the citizens of other States, and aliens. It is first contended that the proviso falls within the inhibition of section 17 of the Bill of Rights, which at the date of the conveyance of the land in controversy by Pierce Buffington read as follows: "No distinction shall ever be made between citizens and aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property." Does the proviso mentioned make "a distinction between citizens and aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property?" We are inclined to think that it is a regulation of the manner of transferring property within the State, instead of a restriction upon its descent. However, that question is immaterial in this case, so far as section 17 of the Bill of Rights is concerned. In no event can it be said that there is a distinction between citizens and aliens in the present case, for it does not appear that the plaintiff is an alien within the proper meaning of that term. It is alleged by plaintiff, and conceded on the other side, that she is a citizen of the United States. The wife of a citizen of Kansas, who resides in another State, cannot be regarded as an "alien." Webster defines the word as "one born out of the jurisdiction of the United States, and not naturalized," and Bouvier gives a like definition. Anderson's Dictionary of Law defines an "alien" to be "one born in a strange country, under obedience to a strange prince, or out of the ligeance of the king." The amendment to this constitutional provision, which was adopted in 1888, shows that that is the sense in which it is used in our Constitution. Section 17 of the Bill of Rights, as amended, reads as follows: "No distinction shall ever be made between citizens of the State of Kansas, and the citizens of other States and Territories of the United States, in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property. The rights of aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property may be regulated by law." Before this amendment was adopted, citizens and aliens stood upon an equality with reference to the purchase, enjoyment, and descent of real property, but by the amendment the people ordained that the restriction upon the Legislature should be removed, and authorized such discriminating regulations against aliens in this respect as might be deemed wise. The use of the term "alien" in the amendment leaves no doubt of the sense in which the word is used, and furnishes an argument that it was used in the same sense in the original provision. We agree with counsel for plaintiff that the term "citizen," as used in the original provision, refers to citizens of the State of Kansas. Counsel, who filed a brief by the permission of the court as amicus curiæ, contend that the term includes all citizens of the United States, but we are not inclined to agree with that view. We conclude, then, that section 17 of the Bill of Rights had no application to this case.

It is next contended that the proviso is repugnant to that provision of the Federal Constitution which ordains that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the several States," and also violative of a like limitation in the 14th Amendment. We think the proviso is not in conflict with either of these provisions. It makes no discrimination against the citizens of other States in respect to any of the privileges or immunities of general citizenship. The proviso, in connection with other statutes, furnishes a rule regulating the manner of the transfer and transmission of real property. Where a person owns the absolute title to land in Kansas, and his wife is a resident of the State, she must join in the conveyance; but when she is not a resident of Kansas, and therefore not subject to its laws, her signature and conveyance are unnecessary, and the husband alone may convey a good title. It is competent for the Legislature of each State to declare the mode and manner by which real property situate within the State may be transferred by the husband, or by the husband and wife, or by judgment and process of court, so as to divest the husband, or husband and wife, of all estate or interest therein, and also to provide for the distribution of and the right of succession to the estates of deceased persons. "The power of the State to regulate the tenure of real property within her limits, and the modes of its acquisition and transfer, and the rules of its descent, and the extent to which a testamentary disposition of it may be exercised by its owners, is undoubted. It is an established principle of law, everywhere recognized, arising from the necessity of the case, that the disposition of immovable property, whether by deed, descent, or any other mode, is exclusively subject to the government within whose jurisdiction the property is situated." United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 815, 24 L. ed. 192.

It is urged by the plaintiff that the wife is an heir, and as such is entitled to inherit one half of her deceased husband's property, but that the proviso discriminates against widows who reside outside of the State, and deprives them of the right which is accorded to a resident widow. The wife, strictly speaking, is not an heir of the husband, although she is generally spoken of as such; but still, if she is regarded as an heir, the nonresident widow is not deprived of any "privilege or immunity." Under our Statute the property of the husband belongs exclusively to him, as the wife's property is exclusively her own. Neither has any vested interest or control over the property of the other by virtue of the marriage relation. The wife has no estate in the land of the husband. It is a mere possibility, depending upon the death of the husband, or whether he has divested himself of the title prior to his death. If he survives her, no interest is taken by nor transmitted to her heirs. If she survives him, but before his death he conveys the land, or it has been sold on execution or other judicial sale, nothing remains for her to take, and she has been deprived of no right. If there was an attempt to convey by the husband alone when his wife was a resident, the title would remain in her, because the manner of conveying land prescribed by statute had not been pursued; and if there was no judicial sale of the land, and it was not necessary for the payment of debts, a one-half interest would descend to her. In such a case, if she was a nonresident of the State, the conveyance by the husband alone would, under the rules prescribed for conveying, be sufficient to divest the title, and hence there would be nothing for her to inherit. It therefore appears that, if the conveyance is made in the manner prescribed by statute, there is nothing for either the resident or nonresident widow to inherit. There is really no discrimination between the resident and the nonresident widow, for each takes one half of all the real property which her husband owned at the time of his death. When the husband's land has been conveyed in accordance with law during his life, there is no descent to either, for there is nothing to descend. For reasons that were deemed sufficient, the Legislature made the signature and conveyance of the nonresident wife unnecessary. The fact that the wife did not accompany her husband to Kansas, or had abandoned him and gone to another State, and may or may not have obtained a divorce elsewhere, thus leaving the status of the parties in doubt, and making it difficult to obtain a perfect transfer of land in many cases, may have been deemed sufficient reason for prescribing this rule of conveyance. The Statute was enacted shortly after the admission of the State, and when it was rapidly increasing in population, through immigration from many of the eastern States, and also foreign countries, many coming without their wives and families; and possibly the rule was adopted to avoid inconvenience and deception in the transfer of real property. The "immunities" and "privileges" referred to in the Federal Constitution would not, in any event, include the claim made by the plaintiff. Those terms "mean that all citizens of the United States shall have the right to acquire property and hold it, and this property shall be protected and secured by the laws of the State in the same manner as the property of the citizens of the State is protected; that this property shall not be subject to any burdens or taxes not imposed on the property of citizens of the State." 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 253. See also 13 L. R. A.

the cases there cited, and Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 380; McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. ed. 248.

According to these authorities, many rights and privileges may be granted by a State, depending to some extent upon the residence of those to whom they are granted, without infringing upon this provision of the Constitution. The privilege of voting, of holding office, or of acting as an administrator of estates, may be withheld until after persons have resided within the State a reasonable period of time, without violating the Constitution; and it is not violated by allowing an attachment against the property of a nonresident debtor without an undertaking, although such process cannot be obtained against a resident without an undertaking. Head v. Daniels, 88 Kan. 1; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 490.

These and many other distinctions do not fall within the privileges and immunities of general citizenship. In treating upon this question, Judge Cooley says: "Although the precise meaning of 'privileges' and 'immunities' is not very clearly settled as yet, it appears to be conceded that the Constitution secures in each State, to the citizens of all the other States, the right to remove to and carry on business therein; the right, by the usual modes, to acquire and hold property, and to protect and defend the same in the law; the right to the usual remedies for the collection of debts, and the enforcement of other personal rights; and the right to be exempt in property and person from taxes or burdens which the property or persons of citizens of the same State are not subject to. To this extent, at least, discriminations could not be made by state laws against them. But it is unquestionable that many other rights and privileges may be made, as they usually are, to depend upon actual residence, such as the right to vote, to have the benefit of exemption laws, to take fish in the waters of the State, and the like." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 490; also note on page 25.

There are several adjudicated cases in other States sustaining a provision of statute substantially similar to the proviso in question. In Pratt v. Tefft, 14 Mich. 191, it was decided that a woman residing out of the State at the time of her husband's death was not entitled to lands lying within the State owned by him, but which had been conveyed without her joining in the deed. Although the estate of dower has been abolished in Kansas, the contingent interest of the wife in the real property of the husband is similar to dower in its inchoate stage; at least, it is substantially similar, so far as the validity of such a provision as we are considering is concerned. In Ligare v. Semple, 32 Mich. 488, it was again decided that "a wife who is a nonresident of the State, at the time the husband makes an absolute conveyance of lands divesting himself entirely of his seisin and estate, has no right of dower, under the statutes of this State, in lands so conveyed." The Supreme Court of Nebraska held that, "where a husband conveys lands in this State while his wife is a nonresident thereof, she has no dower interest in the land thus conveyed." Atkins v. Atkins, 18 Neb. 474.

In Bennett v. Harms, 51 Wis. 251, a like provision of the Statute was under consideration, and the point was directly made that it conflicted with the Constitution of the United States by discriminating against non-resident citizens, but the validity of the statute is sustained in an elaborate opinion. A like question has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States under a law of Louisiana which discriminated in favor of women who contracted marriage within the State, or who contracted marriage out of the State, and afterwards went there to live, and it was claimed to be in conflict with the provision of the Federal Constitution that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" but it was ruled, Judge Curtis delivering the opinion, that such discrimination had no connection with that clause of the Constitution. Conner v. Elliot, 59 U. S. 18 How. 591, 15 L. ed. 497. Following these decisions, we conclude that the Statute is not repugnant to the Federal Constitution; and, if we are in error in this regard, the parties are entitled to have the decision reviewed in the Supreme Court of the United States.

We find no error in the record, and therefore the judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

(....Mich.....)

An ordinance establishing the weight of the loaves of bread that shall be offered for sale within the city, and fixing a penalty for offering for sale short-weight loaves, cannot be successfully attacked as not being within the police power, nor as taking property without compensation, or abridging, or unlawfully interfering with, the right to carry on business.

(July 28, 1891.)

CERTIORARI to the Recorder's Court of the City of Detroit to review three certain judgments convicting defendants of a violation of one of the ordinances of said city. Writ dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Look and H. F. Chipman, for appellants:

By the terms of the ordinance, bread is required to be made of good, wholesome flour or meal, into loaves of one, two and four pounds, and no other, avoirdupois weight.

The undisputed testimony in the case shows that these provisions of the ordinance are impossible to be complied with.

A statute imposing impossible conditions is void.

NOTE.—City ordinance regulating weights and measures.

A city ordinance for the regulation of the standard of weights and measures, which provided that the sealer might inspect the weights and measures every six months, and "as much oftener as he thinks proper," and also provided that when the weights and measures were not in conformity with the standard they should be sent by the owners to 13 L. R. A.

Powers' App. 29 Mich. 509.

If the respondents comply with this ordinance, they lose large quantities of valuable material every time a loaf is baked, and for which they receive no remuneration or return, and for which loss there is no redress.

This Act is void in abridging the privileges and immunities of the respondents, viz.: the right to do as they please with their own property, and to manufacture a loaf of any wholesome ingredients they may see fit; and of such size and weight as they may deem most salable and marketable.

Mr. Charles W. Casgrain for appellee.

McGrath, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes from the Recorders' Court of the City of Detroit by writ of certiorari, defendants having been convicted of a violation of a city ordinance. By stipulation, the cases come up on one record. Defendants are bakers, and are charged with making for sale, selling, and offering for sale, bread that was deficient in weight under the ordinance.

The ordinance is entitled "An Ordinance Relative to the Manufacture and Selling of Bread." The ordinance provides that it shall not be lawful for any person to carry on the trade or business of baker, without first having obtained from the common council a permit for that purpose. It next prescribes how the permit shall be obtained, and that the clerk shall keep a record of the permits granted. It then concludes as follows: "Sec. 4. All bread of every description, manufactured by the bakers of this city for sale, shall be made of good and wholesome flour or meal, into loaves of one pound, two pounds, and four pounds (and no other) avoirdupois weight; and no baker shall make for sale, or shall sell or expose for sale, any bread that shall be deficient in weight, according to the requisitions prescribed in the preceding section of this chapter: provided, always, that such deficiency in the weight of such bread shall be ascertained by the sealer of weights and measures, by weighing, or causing to be weighed, in his presence, within eight hours after the same shall have been baked, sold, or exposed for sale; and provided, further, that whenever any allowance in the weight shall be claimed on account of any bread having been baked, sold, or exposed for sale more than eight hours, as aforesaid the burden of proof in respect to the time when the same shall have been baked, sold, or exposed for sale shall devolve upon the defendant or baker of such bread. Sec. 5. The sealer of weights and measures, under the direction of the chief of police, shall be inspector of bread; and it shall be his duty, and he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, and not less than once in each month, at all seasonable hours, to enter into and inspect and examine every baker's shop, storehouse, or other building where any bread is or shall be baked, stored, or deposited, or offered for sale, and to inspect and examine, in any part of said city, any person or persons, wagons or other carriages, carrying any loaf of bread for the purpose of sale, and weighing the same, and determine whether the same are in violation of the true intent and meaning of this chapter; and, if the said inspector shall find any bread not conformable to the directions herein contained, or any part of them, he shall make complaint thereof for the purpose of having such person prosecuted according to law. Sec. 6. No person or persons shall obstruct, or in any manner impede or willfully delay, the said sealer of weights and measures in the execution of his duties under this Act, either by refusing him or delaying his entrance or admission into any of the places above named, or refuse or omit to stop their wagon or carriage as aforesaid, whereby the due execution of this ordinance or any part of it, shall be impeded or obstructed. Sec. 7 Any violation of any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be punished by a fine not to exceed fifty dollars and the cost of prosecution; and the offender may be imprisoned in the Detroit house of correction until the payment thereof: provided, always, that the term of imprisonment shall not exceed the period of six months."

The defendants insist (1) that matters contained within the body of the ordinance are not within its title; (2) that by the ordinance private property is taken without compensation; (3) that the ordinance abridges the right of the respondents to manufacture loaves of bread of such size or weight as they may deem most salable; (4) that it curtails defendants' business, and places a limitation upon the capacity of respondents to carry on a lawful business; (5) that the ordinance is not within the police powers of the State.

There is no force in the first objection, as the provisions of the ordinance are clearly within the scope of its title. It has been held that the constitutional provisions relating to the title of laws passed by the Legislature do not apply to ordinances enacted by a common council of a city. People v. Hanrahan, 75 Mich. 611-615, 4 L. R. A. 751. The ordinance does not provide for the taking, seizing, or destruction of short-weight bread. It does prohibit the sale of bread which is deficient in weight. The same objection might be made to ordinances prohibiting the importation of infected rags, or the sale of diseased cattle or of unsound beef, or of decayed vegetables, or of illuminating oils which are below the standard test, or of watered milk. In Wheeler v. Russell, 7 Mass. 258, it was held that no recovery could be had for the price and value of shingles which were not of the statutory dimensions. In Raton v. Kegan, 114 Mass. 433, it was held that, in view of the Statute requiring oats and meal to be sold by the bushel, no recovery could be had for the price and value of those articles when sold by the bag.

It is claimed by defendants that, in order to get a pound of baked bread, they are compelled to put into the oven more than a pound of dough, and that the process of baking reduces the weight, and, when asked what it is that evaporates, they reply, "Water." But they say the process of baking is not always uniform. The oven may be too hot. In such case, the bread crusts or skins quickly, retaining the moisture. And again, it may be too cold; in which case the bread dries up, rather than bakes, and, in order to insure a pound loaf, the latter contingency must be provided against, and the weight of the dough must always be regulated accordingly. That fermentation is not always regular, and, when it reaches a certain point, the dough must be put into the oven, without reference to the condition of the oven. That the cutting up of the dough, the weighing of it, and its transfer to the oven is necessarily hurried, and the scales are liable to become clogged or affected by dust. Notwithstanding all the difficulties suggested by respondents, the evidence shows that the bread inspector has been diligent in the performance of his duties; had frequently visited the several bakeries of defendants, and but one of these defendants has before this time been complained of, and that was fifteen years ago; and it is admitted by defendants, not only that the ordinance may be complied with, but that the short-weight bread discovered by the inspector was made for the very purpose of testing the validity of this ordinance; and, after the authorities had caused complaint to be made against defendants, they resumed the former manner of doing business, and made their bread in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance. Again, it is claimed that a barrel of flour will make two hundred and fifty loaves of bread, and that it is impossible to distribute an ordinary advance in price of flour over this product; in other words, that the price of a loaf of bread cannot be advanced a fraction of a cent. This difficulty affects the retail dealer more than the wholesaler. It has to be met in the sale of a pound of nails, of a dozen buttons, or of a paper of needles, as well as in the sale of a loaf of bread. The ordinance does not attempt to regulate the price of the commodity. That is not necessarily fixed with reference to flour at its cheapest price, so that, until the price of flour is reduced until it reaches a point where the reduction may be distributed, the dealer gets the advantage of the reduction, and when it advances above the standard the consumer gets the advantage, until a point is reached where the advance may be added. This fluctuation and these results are ordinary incidents of trade. The State may institute any reasonable preventive remedy when the frequency of the frauds, or the difficulty experienced by individuals in circumventing them, is so great that no other means will prove efficacious. Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 89, p. 208. Bread is an article of general consumption. It is usually sold by the loaf, and the individual consumer, in the majority of cases, buys by the single loaf. Each transaction involves but a few pennies, although the number of individual transactions in a large city reaches each day into the thousands, and the opportunities for fraud are frequent. It would be practically impossible to prevent fraud in the sale of short-weight loaves, if the matter was left to the ordinary legal remedy afforded the individual consumer for fraud or deceit. The amount involved would not justify a resort to litigation. Sales are invariably made in loaves of the size of one, two, or four pound packages, and the ordinance simply takes the usual and ordinary packages or loaves into which bread is made, and fixes the standard of weight of each package. It does not prohibit the sale of bread by weight if it overruns, as it is claimed that it sometimes does, nor does it prohibit the exaction of an increased price by reason of the additional weight. It does not prohibit the sale of a half or a quarter or any other fraction of a loaf. Our statutes not only fix the number of pounds of each of the various commodities that shall constitute a bushel, but they also provide that a "box" or "basket" of peaches shall contain one third of a bushel, and they fix the size of a "barrel" of fruit, roots, or vegetables, and they may, with equal propriety, fix the weight of a package or loaf of bread.

The police power of a State is not confined to regulations looking to the preservation of life, health, good order, and decency. Laws providing for the detection and prevention of imposition and fraud, as a general proposition, are free from constitutional objection. Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, p. 208, § 89.

The charter of the City of Detroit empowers the common council "to direct and regulate the weight and quantity of bread, the size of the loaf, and the inspecting thereof." The ordinance is clearly within this provision, and it cannot, under the decision in People v. Armstrong, 73 Mich. 293, 2 L. R. A. 721, be subjected to the test of reasonableness.

The convictions are affirmed, and the writ dismissed.

1. A grantor of the fee of the surface of land may reserve an estate in fee in the minerals and each estate will be subject to the Law of Descent, Devise and Conveyance.

2. The right to minerals, timber and a mill-site reserved to the grantor in conveyance of certain parcels of land within a larger tract will not pass by his subsequent conveyance of the whole tract expressly deducting therefrom the parcels of land previously conveyed.

NOTE.—Reservations in deeds; term defined.

Reservation has been defined as the creation of a right or interest, which had no prior existence as such, in a thing or part of a thing granted. Kister v. Reeser, 98 Pa. 5.

By a reservation in a deed a new right is created in the thing granted which did not previously exist, and is reserved to the grantor. An "exception" is always part of the thing granted, and the whole of the thing excepted. A reservation may be a right or interest in the particular part which it affects. The terms are often used in the same sense. Though apt words of reservation be used, they will be continued as an exception, if such was the design of the parties. Ibid.; Perkins v. Stockwell, 131 Mass. 530; Kimball v. Withington, 141 Mass. 379. See also Bowman v. A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Menafee County sustaining demurrers to a bill filed to quiet title to certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Lindsay, with Messrs. S. F. J. Trabue, E. F. Trabue and W. P. D. Bush, for appellants:

Plaintiffs having the legal title, and being in possession, it was proper to make as many persons parties to their bill as have adverse claims.

Rich v. Zeilsdorff, 22 Wis. 547; Anderson, Law Dict. title, Reservation.

A distinction noted.

The distinction between a reservation and an exception is, that by an exception the grantor withdraws from the effect of the grant some part of the thing itself which exists in substance at the time of making the grant, and which is included in the granted premises; while a reservation is of some new right or other thing issuing or coming out of that which is granted, and not a part of the thing itself (Shep. Touch. 80; Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 815; Marshall v. Trumbull, 28 Conn. 188; State v. Wilson, 42 Me. 9; Ives v. Van Auker, 34 Barb. 596; Ashcroft v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 196; Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. 197; Bridger v. Pierson, 1 Lans. 481; Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 107 Mass. 290; Munn v. Worrall, 53 N. Y. 44; Moulton v. Trafton, 64 Me. 218; or it may be of an existing easement or servitude, not capable of being severed from the grant. Cudler v. Tufts, 8 Pick. 272, 278; Doe v. Lock, 4 Nev. & M. 807; Pettee v. Hawes, 18 Pick. 323, 326; Hurd v. Curtis, 7 Met. 110.

And whether a restriction in a deed will be deemed a reservation or an exception depends less upon the words used than upon the nature of the right or thing reserved or excepted. Barnes v. Burt, 38 Conn. 541; Martindale, Conv. 2d ed. § 118.

What may be reserved.

A reservation cannot be made by parol (Gibbon v. Dillingham, 10 Ark. 9; Wintermute v. Light, 46 Barb. 278; Turner v. Cool, 23 Ind. 56. But see Backenstoss v. Stahler, 33 Pa. 251), and a reservation to a stranger is void. Hornbeck v. Westbrook, 9 Johns. 73.

It is for the benefit of the grantor and his successors, and not for that of persons claiming title to property not conveyed by the deed, and derived from other sources. Moulton v. Faught, 41 Me. 296.

Generally, the same rules of construction apply to a reservation or implied grant as to an express grant. Ashcroft v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 196, 30 Am. Rep. 672; French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. 96.

The words "reserving to myself the right of passing and repassing, and repairing my aqueduct logs forever through a culvert," were held to vest an estate for life only (Ashcroft v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 196, 30 Am. Rep. 672), so of the words, "reserving to the grantor the use and control, etc., during his natural life" (Richardson v. York, 14 Me. 216), and so of a reservation, "for the use of our mother." Keeler v. Wood, 30 Vt. 242; Boone, Real Prop. § 308.

A reservation (in a deed) of, and an agreement for, all the marble from certain land, that the grantor might want to manufacture, is not a grant of an exclusive right. Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 339, 19 L. ed. 955.

When a reservation is made in a deed, it is not necessary, in order to give it effect, that the grantor should, when he executes the deed, assert verbally his right to the property excepted from the conveyance; and evidence that he made no such assertion is inadmissible. Hornbuckle v. Stafford, 111 U. S. 339, 28 L. ed. 468.

Where a grantor conveys land, "saving and reserving, nevertheless, for his own use the coal contained in the said piece or parcel of land, together with free ingress and egress by wagon road to haul the coal therefrom as wanted," the clause operates as an exception, and the grantor retains the entire and perpetual property in the coal. Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. 197; 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 960.

A reservation of minerals and mining rights from a grant of the estate, followed by a grant to another of all that which was first reserved, vests in the second grantee an estate as broad as if the entire estate had been first granted to him with a reservation of the surface. Stoughton's App. 88 Pa. 198, 201; Duke v. Hague, 107 Pa. 57, 66; Broman v. Young, 85 Hun, 178, 181; First Nat. Bank of Rhoeburg v. Dow, 41 Hun, 13.

The nature of a transaction, as well as the language may be regarded in deciding whether language in a deed constitutes a reservation or a condition. Foxcroft v. Mallett, 45 U. S. 4 How. 353, 11 L. ed. 1008.

Reservation in mortgage.

In those States in which the common-law doctrine of mortgages prevails, the mortgagee is entitled to immediate possession of the mortgaged premises, unless the right to retain the possession until default is reserved to the mortgagor. Martindale, Conv. § 407, p. 348.

In such States, therefore, if it be the intention that the mortgagor shall retain the possession, a clause should be inserted to that effect (Coffey v. Hunt, 75 Ala. 236). In the absence of any provision of the kind, parol evidence cannot be received to prove that such was the intention of the parties at the time of making the mortgage. Though it has been held that the agreement need not to be expressed in the mortgage, but may be implied from a note made by the mortgagor to the mortgagee at the same time with the mortgage (Clay v. Wren, 34 Me. 187), although the note was not referred to in the mortgage. Martindale, Conv. § 453.

Messrs. Peters & Tyler, Thomas Turner and H. C. Lilly & Son, for appellees:

The court did right in requiring plaintiffs to elect. The relief sought against Gray is inconsistent with that sought against the other defendants.

By his deed to Plummer and Kincaid, Duckham did not pass the timber, minerals, and mill-seat which he had reserved to himself in the deeds to the McGowans.

Bainbridge, Mines, p. 168.

Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants' petition contains three paragraphs: the first against William Gray, the second against the appellees, and the third against John M. Clayton. The allegations of the petition which are common to all the paragraphs are, that on the fourth day of January, 1786, the Commonwealth of Virginia granted to Dean Timmons twenty-two thousand acres of land, which lie in Menefee and Wolfe Counties, this State, and that Thomas Duckham, on the ninth day of June, 1843, he being the owner thereof, sold said survey of land to Edward Kincaid, the appellant's ancestor, and Samuel Plummer, except the tracts previously sold by Thomas Duckham to Powell Rose, James Cox and J. P. McGowan. That on the fourth day of October, 1846, Samuel Plummer sold his undivided interest in said land to Edward Kincaid, who thereby became the owner of the whole, and held and owned said land at the time of his death, except the tracts which he had previously sold to Dr. William Congleton, Spencer and John —, and George Centers. That the appellants, as the children and grandchildren of Edward Kincaid, he having died intestate, inherited said land from him, and that they own and are in the actual possession of the same, except said parcels sold by Edward Kincaid, and the tracts sold by Duckham to Powell Rose, James Cox and J. P. McGowan.

The first paragraph of the petition alleges that Wm. Gray holds a deed to five hundred acres of said land; that the deed purports on its face to have been executed by Thomas Duckham as the attorney in fact of Edward Kincaid, but that said Duckham had no authority from Edward Kincaid to make said conveyance, and that the said deed is void, but, nevertheless, cast a cloud upon their title, which the appellants ask the chancellor to remove by declaring said deed to be void, etc.

The second paragraph alleges that the appellees "are setting up some sort of claim to some part or interest in the said balance of said twenty-two thousand-acre tract," under some contract made with Thomas Duckham, the vendor of Edward Kincaid. Appellants also allege that they do not know the exact nature of the appellees' claim, but do know that they are giving out in speeches that they own and have the right to hold, possess and sell portions of said plaintiffs' lands, and also the minerals under and timber upon certain other parts of said survey of twenty-two thousand acres, which minerals and timber belong to these plaintiffs. It is also alleged that the claim of the appellees, although groundless, impairs the value of the appellants' land and casts a cloud upon their title. The chancellor is asked to compel appellees to exhibit any title they may have to said land, or to the minerals and timber under and upon any land lying within the said twenty-two thousand-acre survey; and that the appellants' title be quieted, etc. The third paragraph alleges that John M. Clayton "asserts that he holds title to some portion of the said balance of the twenty-two thousand-acre survey, as the remote vendee of Thomas Duckham, and gives out publicly that he can sell and pass a good title to purchasers, and that these plaintiffs have not a good title," whereby he greatly impairs the vendible value of their estate. They also allege that the claim of Clayton is groundless. They ask that he be required to exhibit his claim of title, and that their title be quieted, etc.

Upon motion of the appellees, the lower court required the appellants to elect to proceed on the first paragraph or second and third paragraphs. The appellants excepting to the ruling of the court, elected, under protest, to proceed on the second and third paragraphs.

Thereafter the appellants amended the second paragraph of their petition. The appellees then entered a general and special demurrer to the second paragraph of the appellants' petition as amended, both of which were sustained by the lower court, and the appellants electing to stand by their pleadings, the second paragraph was dismissed. They have appealed to this court. The amended petition sets out a more specific description of the land claimed by appellants. It also exhibits two deeds of conveyance from Thomas Duckham to James P. McGowan, the first dated the 2d day of February, 1842, and the second dated the 21st day of November, 1842. The first deed conveys a certain boundary within the twenty-two thousand-acre survey, but "reserves" to the grantor "all minerals and mines in the bowels of the boundary" conveyed, "and one half of the timber included in said boundary, and a mill-site on Glady Creek."

The second deed conveys a certain other boundary of land within said twenty-two thousand-acre survey, but reserves to the grantor "one half of all the mines and minerals in the bowels of the earth" within said boundary, and "one half of the timber thereon," except on the south side of the river. On that side he reserves all of the timber, except that which is "on Swift Camp."

It is alleged in the appellants' amended petition that the minerals and timber claimed in their original petition are the minerals and timber reserved in these two deeds. The special demurrer raises the question of the appellants' right to these minerals and timber. We will dispose of that question first. The appellants' contention is that they are entitled to the minerals and timber reserved by Duckham in said conveyances, by virtue of his deed to Edward Kincaid and Samuel Plummer, dated the ninth of June, 1843, which conveyed to them all of the twenty-two thousand-acre survey of land, only deducting therefrom "what" Duckham had sold and made deeds to prior to that date. In other words, that Duckham's reservations in said deeds, being a landed estate of inheritance in himself, were included in his conveyance of the entire twenty-two thousand-acre survey, which conveyance, to Edward Kincaid and Samuel Plummer, only excepted the surface conveyances previously made by him.

An estate in fee in land carries with it all metals and minerals thereunder, unless the metals and minerals are accepted in the conveyance, or "have before been served in ownership, and the right thereto vested in some other person." The surface and the metals and minerals may be a distinct property from each other by separate conveyances from individuals. Bingham, Sales of Real Property, p. 288.

Minerals in place are land. They are subject to conveyance. The surface right may be in one man and the mineral right in another. Both in such a case are landowners. They own separate and distinct corporeal hereditaments. Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 475.

The owner of land may convey a surface estate in fee in it, and reserve to himself an estate in fee in the minerals, or any particular species of them, in which case the vendee holds a distinct and separate estate in the surface or soil, and the vendor holds a distinct and separate estate in the minerals. By this severance each estate is subject to the laws of descent, of devise, of conveyance. Adam v. Briggs Iron Co. 7 Cush. 861.

Also, by the severance each estate is as distinct property in the respective owners as is the property in a two-story house, where the title to the lower story is in one person and the title to the upper story is in another person. An action of ejectment will lie in behalf of the owner of the surface to recover it; also, an action will lie in behalf of the owner of the mineral estate to recover it; also the right of either owner may be barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Now, then, Duckham sold to McGowan two parcels of land out of a larger boundary which he owned. These two parcels of land were each designated and set apart by metes and bounds, thereby becoming separate and distinct tracts of land, not only from each other, but from Duckham's remaining portion of the survey. The title to the surface or soil, however, was only conveyed to McGowan in each of these boundaries, together with such portions of the minerals and timber as above set forth.

Duckham retained his title to the other minerals and timber, also a mill-site on one of the tracts. The interest that he retained was a separate and distinct interest in the two boundaries, which interest by the said conveyances, by metes and bounds, became separate and distinct from the remaining portion of the survey. Indeed, it not only became a distinct interest from the remaining portion of the survey, but a distinct and separate estate from the surface estate which was conveyed to McGowan. So Duckham owned, after these two conveyances, an absolute estate in all of the remaining portion of the twenty-two thousand-acre survey, and also owned a distinct estate in the other two parcels, consisting of minerals, timber and a mill-site. He sold to Edward Kincaid and Samuel Plummer the remaining survey, which he called, in the deed of conveyance, land. Of course this, by operation of law, passed title within that boundary to the vendees to the center of the earth, and included the minerals therein. In that deed he expressly deducted the parcels of land theretofore conveyed. In these parcels he owned a mineral and timber interest and a mill-site. These parcels were separate parcels from the portions sold to Kincaid and Plummer; also Duckham's interest therein was separate from said portion.

Now, it seems to us clear that the deed from Duckham to Kincaid and Plummer did not embrace the separate and distinct mineral and timber interest and mill-site that Duckham owned in these two tracts of land, which has been previously separated from the portion of the survey sold to Kincaid and Plummer.

Bainbridge, on the Law of Mines and Minerals, American ed., side page 129, says: "When mines form part of the general inheritance, they will, of course, be transferred along with the lands, without being expressly mentioned in the conveyance; but when they form a distinct possession or inheritance, a distinct title to them must also be established."

"In the latter situation the mines will still, of course, retain the qualities of real estate, and will be transferred by conveyances applicable to the particular disposition of them intended to be made."

So it seems that the mineral and timber interest and mill-site reserved by Duckham in these two tracts of land, being a distinct interest from the surface right conveyed, and also being separated from the balance of the twenty-two thousand-acre survey by designated boundaries, it would require apt words to convey these separate interests. To illustrate, suppose the mill-site reserved had had upon it a fine flouring mill, or there had been a valuable stone quarry (which is a mineral interest) opened on the land, or a fine lead or silver seam on it, worth thousands of dollars, would it be contended that the conveyance of the adjoining portion of the survey—we say adjoining, because the two tracts had become separated from it by metes and bounds—would include these interests? Surely not. The unhesitating answer would be that these were distinct and separate interests, which could only be conveyed by apt words.

We think, therefore, that the lower court did right in sustaining the special demurrer to the second paragraph of the petition.

The next question is, Was the general demurrer rightfully sustained?

It is distinctly alleged in the petition that the appellants have the legal title to all the balance of the twenty-two thousand-acre survey, after deducting the parcels previously sold by Duckham and the parcels sold by Edward Kincaid after his purchase, and that they are in the actual possession of said balance, less about one thousand acres occupied by squatters. It is also alleged, in substance, in the first paragraph, that Gray claims title to five hundred acres of this balance under a deed which is void. It is alleged, in the second paragraph, that the appellees claim some of this balance by some kind of title derived from Thomas Duckham. It is also alleged that Clayton claims a part of said land by some kind of title derived from Duckham.

By an Act of the Legislature, approved March 9, 1854, it is provided "that hereafter it shall and may be lawful for any person, having both the legal title and possession of lands, to institute and prosecute suit by petition in equity, in the circuit court of the county where the lands, or some part thereof, may lie, against any other person setting up claim thereto; and if the plaintiff shall be able to establish, and does establish, his title to said land, the defendant shall be by the court ordered and decreed to release his claim thereto," etc. This Act was not repealed by the General Statutes, and is now in full force.

Pomeroy, in his work on Remedies and Remedial Rights, section 369, in treating of actions to quiet titles, says: "The very object of the proceeding assumes that there are other claimants, adverse to the plaintiff, setting up titles and interests in the land or other subject matter hostile to his. Of course, all these adverse claimants are proper parties defendant, and if the decree is to accomplish its full effect of putting all litigation to rest, they are necessary defendants." He further says, on the same page, that "this action has been greatly extended by statute, especially in the western States, and is there an ordinary means of trying a disputed title between two opposite claimants. The general scope of these statutes is as follows: The plaintiff must be in possession claiming an estate in the lands. The adverse claimant or claimants must be out of possession, and must assert a hostile title or interest. In this condition, the possessor of the land, without waiting for any proceeding, legal or equitable, to be instituted against him, may take the initiative, and, by commencing an equitable action, may compel his adversaries to come into court, assert their titles, and have the controversy put to rest in a single judgment. It is plain, therefore, that this statutory suit is the converse of the legal action of ejectment."

So it is clear that by the Act of the Legislature of the ninth of March, 1854, any person having the legal title and possession of land may bring an action in equity in the circuit court of the county where the land or some part of it may lie, against any person setting up claim thereto, for the purpose of establishing and quieting his title to said land. But for this remedy, what remedy would the owner of the legal title and possessor of the land have? He cannot bring an action of ejectment, because he has the possession of the land. The adverse claim, however worthless it may be, clouds his title, and may be used injuriously to embarrass and belittle it, and to greatly depreciate its market value, for prudent persons would neither buy the property, at a fair value, while thus affected, nor loan money upon its security, although assured by the best lawyers that the adverse claim was worthless. The object of the statute was, therefore, to provide a certain remedy, notwithstanding the fact that equity, independently of the statute, affords substantially the same remedy.

The suit authorized by the Statute of the ninth of March, 1854, is the converse of the legal action of ejectment. See Pomeroy, supra. And this court, in Woolfolk v. Ashby, 2 Met. 289, having decided that an action of ejectment will lie against as many persons as hold an adverse possession of the land, although each one holds the possession of a distinct parcel from the other, and by a distinct claim of right, it follows that, under the Statute, supra, in an action to quiet the title to land, all persons setting up claim thereto, whether or not each claims a separate parcel of the land by distinct right, may be joined in the suit as defendants.

Also, it seems clear that in an equitable action to quiet the title to land, independently of the statutory authority, all of the adverse claimants, whether by independent titles or not, may be joined as defendants. Indeed, as the object to be accomplished is the putting of all litigation about the title to rest, it is not only desirable, but proper, to make all adverse claimants defendants. See Pomeroy, supra.

In the case of Scott v. Means, 80 Ky. 460, the petition did not disclose that there was a controversy between the parties as to the location of the boundary. It simply alleged that the defendants had trespassed upon plaintiffs' lands, and slandered their title. For trespass upon land or the slander of title an action at law for compensatory damages is ordinarily an adequate remedy. Therefore, this court held, in that case, that an action in equity to quiet title and settle the question as to the alleged trespass would not lie. Also, that as the plaintiffs' right in the possession of the land in dispute could be settled by an action at law, such action at law should have preceded an action in the nature of a bill of peace. The other cases relied on by appellees involve the same principle. Those cases are unlike this. Here the appellants, as alleged by them, are the owners of the land, and have the actual possession of it. The appellees are not complained of as trespassers or slanderers of the title, but as adverse claimants of the title, which beclouds the appellants' title, and injures the market value of their land. For this wrong there is no redress, except by an action in equity to quiet title.

We think that the lower court erred in sustaining the general demurrer to the second paragraph of the petition and in ruling the appellants to elect.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the case is remanded, with directions for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

LIME ROCK NATIONAL BANK

v.

W. G. R. MOWRY et al.

Charles A. SINCLAIR, Petitioner.

(.....N. H.....)

1. The assignment as collateral for future advances of a mortgage executed to secure an existing debt, is not prohibited by a statutory provision that no estate conveyed in mortgage shall be held by the mortgagee for any obligation or liability arising after the execution and delivery of the mortgage.
2. The mortgagee's acquisition of the equity of redemption will not work a merger of the mortgage, if during all the time he owns such equity the mortgage is held by one to whom it had been assigned as collateral security for the mortgagee's debt.

(July 31, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by petitioner to rulings of the Trial Term of the Supreme Court for Grafton County (Smith, J.), refusing to vacate a decree foreclosing a mortgage. Overruled. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bingham & Mitchell, for petitioner:

This assignment, if treated as a mortgage, as

NOTE.—Absolute assignment, when a mortgage.

An absolute assignment of a mortgage, with an agreement to sell the same to the assignor on receiving the amount intended to be secured, by a certain day, is a mortgage. Clark v. Henry, 3 Cow. 324.

Where a mortgagee makes an absolute assignment of his mortgage debt and of the mortgage, such assignment is sufficient to vest in the assignee the full legal title of the mortgage to the mortgaged premises, although no words of inheritance are used. Barnes v. Boardman, 3 L. R. A. 786, and note, 149 Mass. 106.

Form and sufficiency of assignment.

An assignment in short form on the back of a mortgage may be made by a corporation as well as by an individual, and without the appointment of an attorney appearing in the instrument. Chilton v. Brooks, 69 Md. 584.

The omission of the words "of Baltimore City," from the name of the assignor in the assignment of a mortgage is immaterial, where the mortgage itself gives the full name of the assignor corporation, and it also appears on the back of the assignment. Ibid.

An assignment neither attested by a witness, nor acknowledged in such manner as to dispense with such attestation, is not sufficient to convey the legal title of the mortgage, but only an equity. Sanders v. Cassady, 86 Ala. 246.

And the assignee cannot execute a power of sale thereby given, unless the debt secured has been transferred to him so as to pass the legal title thereto. Sanford v. Kane, 8 L. R. A. 724, and note, 133 Ill. 199. See Sanders v. Cassady, 86 Ala. 246.

So an assignment not under seal without purporting to convey an estate in the land does not confer the mortgagee's title on the assignee so as to authorize him to execute the power of sale contained in the mortgage. Dameron v. Eskridge, 104 N. C. 621.

Yet the assignee of a mortgage can enforce it, although there are no apt words of conveyance in his assignment to carry the legal title. Johnson v. Beard (Ala.) June 18, 1891; Martinez v. Lindsay (Ala.) Jan. 30, 1891.

The validity of the assignment of a mortgage cannot be impeached by the mortgagor in a suit by the assignee to enforce it. Johnson v. Beard, supra.

But an action instituted by the assignee may be defeated by the mortgagor by showing that there was no legal assignment. Salinas v. Pearsall, 24 S. C. 179.

The mortgage partakes of the negotiability of its principal, the note, without any formal assignment. 18 L. R. A.

ment or delivery, or even mention of the former, and the transfer without notice will not be affected by any undisclosed lien or secret trust. Hagerman v. Sutton, 8 West. Rep. 312, 91 Mo. 519. See Carpenter v. Longan, 88 U. S. 18 Wall. 271, 21 L. ed. 313; Lewis v. Kirk, 28 Kan. 497. Contra in Minnesota. Oster v. Mickley, 35 Minn. 245.

Assignment as collateral security.

Where the assignment of the notes and mortgage was as collateral security, it transferred the legal title, and being for a loan, it constituted a mortgage. Rice v. Dillingham, 73 Me. 62. See Pond v. Eddy, 113 Mass. 149; Cutts v. York Mfg. Co. 18 Me. 191; Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1 Paige, 48, 2 L. ed. 557.

The assignment of a mortgage by the mortgagee, as collateral security for his own debt, is in substance a mortgage or pledge of the transferred security. Gilbert v. Thayer, 6 Cent. Rep. 218, 104 N. Y. 200.

The foreclosure of the mortgage assigned as collateral, and purchase by the assignee at the sale as against the assignor, work no other result than to substitute the land for the mortgage in the hands of the assignee, and to leave it subject to the assignor's right, by payment of the debt, to reclaim and hold his own property discharged of the assignee's lien upon it. Gilbert v. Thayer, 6 Cent. Rep. 218, 104 N. Y. 200; Hoyt v. Martense, 16 N. Y. 231; Slee v. Manhattan Co. supra.

Where by the laws of New York such assignee is the "trustee of an express trust," and may sue without joining the assignor, the judgment is conclusive against the assignor as to the amount of the debt, not only in that State, but in all other States. Chew v. Brumagen, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 497, 20 L. ed. 663. See Cummings v. Morris, 25 N. Y. 625; Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 369; St. John v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 N. Y. 31.

Where the holder of the assigned mortgage takes a conveyance of the mortgaged property without a judicial sale and releases the mortgage, he may be treated as having wrongfully converted the property of the debtor, who may hold the creditor for the value thereof, and have his debt satisfied and recover the balance. Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122.

Where a mortgage of real estate has been assigned as collateral security for a debt other than the mortgage debt, the property, as well after foreclosure as before, is held for the benefit of both pledgor and pledgee, and must be disposed of for the benefit of both. The price bid at the sale does not operate as payment upon the debt for which the mortgage was pledged. First Nat. Bank of Jeffersonville v. Ohio Falls Car & L. Works, 20 Fed.

it must be, cannot cover future advances from the assignee to the assignor.

In Hoyt v. Martense, 16 N. Y. 234, the court said, in considering the effect of an assignment, it was, in effect, a mortgage of a mortgage.

See also Whitney v. McKinney, 7 Johns. Ch. 146, 2 L. ed. 250.

The mortgage, in the hands of an assignee, is subject to the same objections and equities that it is in the hands of the assignor.

Freeman v. Auld, 44 N. Y. 50; Olds v. Cummings, 31 Ill. 188; Union College v. Wheeler, 61 N. Y. 88-104.

The assignee, holding a mortgage as collateral security, can recover judgment only for the sum for which the mortgage can legally be held as collateral.

As to creditors, even if the assignment could be held as security for future advances, the description of the indebtedness should be definite in amount or character.

Where the mortgage was foreclosed without making such assignor a party, and the property was sold for more than the claim it was transferred to secure, and was purchased by the assignee, he is liable to account to the assignor for the excess. Hoyt v. Martense, supra.

Such sale and purchase work no other result than to substitute the land for the mortgage in the hands of the assignee, and to leave it subject to the assignor's right to redeem. Gilbert v. Thayer, 6 Cent. Rep. 222; 104 N. Y. 200; Dalton v. Smith, 86 N. Y. 183.

An agreement by the assignee that in case the mortgaged property is sold he will pay to the mortgagee any sum obtained by him in excess of the debt for which the mortgage was assigned, will not affect the validity of a purchase by the assignee at a foreclosure sale under the mortgage. Eaton v. Rocca, 75 Cal. 93. See Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 28; Manasse v. Dinkelspiel, 68 Cal. 404.

The guaranty by the owner of a mortgage, upon assigning the same, against loss from the mortgage, was limited to the amount paid on the assignment, and the plaintiff, in delaying unreasonably the collection of the mortgage, released the mortgagee from all liability on his guaranty. Griffith v. Robertson, 15 Hun, 345; Leonard v. Morris, 9 Paige, 91, 4 L. ed. 630.

Mortgagee cannot transfer the security without the debt.

A mortgagee, not in possession of the premises, has a mere chattel interest, which is transferable by a sale or assignment of the mortgage itself, together with the debt for the security of which it is given, but not by a grant in fee of the land it covers. *Miner v. Assignment of mortgage debt carries with it the security.

The general rule is familiar that an assignment or transfer of a mortgage debt carries with it an equitable right to an assignment of the mortgage. Sturtevant v. Jaques, 14 Allen, 523; Morris v. Bacon, 123 Mass. 58; Batesville Institute v. Kauffman, 36 U. S. 18 Wall. 151, 21 L. ed. 775; Carpenter v. Longan, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 271, 21 L. ed. 813; Barnes v. Boardman, 3 L. R. In some jurisdictions it is held that the mere transfer of the debt carries the mortgage with it. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. 114, 118.

This doctrine has not prevailed in Massachusetts. In such cases the mortgagee would hold the legal title in trust for the purchaser of the debt, and the latter might obtain a conveyance by a bill in equity. *Wolcott v. The conveyances of June 29 and December 31, 1880, to Mowry, the mortgagee, effected a merger of the legal and equitable estates. This, too, would be the legal effect of his deed of November 14, 1888, to N. S. Mowry.

Messrs. J. W. Remick and E. C. Mowry, contra.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion to vacate a decree for foreclosure of a mortgage by a creditor of the estate of N. S. Mowry, who at his decease was the owner of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises. N. S. Mowry died in the spring of 1889, insolvent. The petitioner became a creditor of N. S. Mowry's estate in October, 1889, by an assignment of a judgment against Mowry and others. The foreclosure proceedings were by bill in equity filed November 6, 1889, in which the administrators upon the estate of N. S. Mowry were made defendants; and at the March Term, 1890, the bill was ordered taken as confessed, and a decree rendered that, unless the defendants pay to the plaintiff, within sixty days from March 18, 1890, the sum of $24,902.16, with interest from that date, and costs of suit taxed at $10.75, a writ of possession issue to the plaintiff to put and secure it in possession of the premises. A writ of possession issued May 20, and the plaintiff was put in possession May 21, 1890. At the September Term, 1890, the motion to vacate the decree was made, and denied sub-both the mortgage and the privilege. Forstall's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 1063; Race v. Bruen, 11 La. Ann. 34; Scott v. Turner, 15 La. Ann. 348; Jeckel v. Fried, 18 La. Ann. 132; *Frost v. Assignment of bonds secured by mortgage.

An assignee of bonds secured by mortgage takes subject to the equities existing between his assignor and a purchaser subject to the mortgage, and cannot hold the latter personally liable for the debt where the assignor has entered into a valid agreement that such purchaser shall not be held personally liable. Duncan v. Finn, 79 Iowa, 658. 18 L. R. A.

The holder of non-negotiable bonds, secured by mortgage, with coupons attached, indorsed and transferred before due, takes subject to the defenses between the original parties. Richardson v. Woodruff, 30 Neb. 132.

The assignee of a bond, with notice of the illegality of the contract which forms the consideration, will not be protected by a declaration of no set-off. Griffiths v. Sears, 3 Cent. Rep. 240, 112 Pa. 523; Duquesne Bank's App. 74 Pa. 426; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 751.

An assignment of a mortgage which did not expressly assign the bond, but stated that the mortgage was made to secure the payment of a certain sum, "according to the conditions of the bond accompanying the same," is a valid assignment of the bond. Yates County Nat. Bank v. Baldwin, 43 Hun, 126.

Where an assignee of a bond and mortgage allowed the mortgagee to take the same for the purpose of getting dates, or for some purpose other than to sell, and the mortgagee sold them, it was held that such assignee had not parted with the possession so as to destroy his lien. Ibid.

Parties have a right to make a contract giving an assignee of a fractional part of a bond and mortgage priority of payment. Thayer's App. (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 479; Patrick's App. 105 Pa. 356; Donley v. Hays, 17 Serg. & R. 400.

A bond and mortgage, although originally executed for a different purpose and without consideration, are valid and enforceable in the hands of the assignee, where mortgagor executes an agreement consenting to the assignment, and covenants that there is due and unpaid the full amount purporting to be secured by the bond and mortgage. Houseman v. Bodine, 122 N. Y. 158.

Assignment of notes secured by mortgage.

The assignment of one or more notes made to the same person and secured by a mortgage operates as an assignment pro tanto of the mortgage, and that the holders of the several notes have priority of lien in the order in which their respective demands become due. The notes so assigned stand as so many successive mortgages. Parkhurst v. Watertown S. E. Co. 6 West. Rep. 284, 107 Ind. 594; Studebaker Mfg. Co. v. McCargur, 20 Neb. 500; Blair v. White, 61 Vt. 110; State Bank v. Tweedy, 3 Blackf. 447; Hough v. Osborne, 7 Ind. 140; Davis v. Langsdale, 41 Ind. 399; Doss v. Ditmars, 70 Ind. 451; The Bank of United States v. Covert, 13 Ohio, 240.

So an indorsee of a part of such notes so secured by mortgage is entitled in equity to payment out of the mortgaged fund, in preference to the notes retained by the mortgagee and assignor, although the notes so assigned may fall due subsequently to ject to exception. The petitioner does not charge any fraud on the part of the administrators of Mowry's estate in not resisting the foreclosure nor offer to redeem the mortgage, but, as the right of the petitioner to appear is not questioned, we express no opinion upon that point. The facts stated show no error in the decree of foreclosure, and the motion to vacate was rightfully denied. The mortgage was given January 23, 1877, by the Waumbeck Lumber Company, to W. G. R. Mowry to secure a note dated October 1, 1876, payable on demand, for $20,282.28, no part of which has ever been paid. April 27, 1878, W. G. R. Mowry assigned the mortgage to the plaintiff, "together with all the debts, claims, and demands upon which the same is predicated, with all the rights thereunto in any wise appertaining," as security for the repayment to the plaintiff of $3,975, and as security for all other sums of money for which he was then indebted or liable, or might thereafter become liable, to the plaintiff. June 29, 1880, Charles G. Smith, assignee in bankruptcy of Waumbeck Lumber Company, conveyed the mortgaged premises to Charles A. Sinclair, and on the same day Sinclair conveyed one undivided half to W. G. R. Mowry, the mortgagee; and on December 8, 1880, he conveyed the other half to McKean and Fletcher; and on December 31, 1880, McKean and Fletcher conveyed their half to W. G. R. Mowry; and on November 14, 1883, W. G. R. Mowry conveyed the premises to N. S. Mowry. Each of these conveyances were made subject to the mortgage from the Waumbeck Lumber Company to W. G. R. Mowry. Upon these facts, as against W. G. R. Mowry, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for the those retained by the mortgagee. People's Sav. Bank of Evansville v. Finney, 68 Ind. 480; Shaw v. Newson, 78 Ind. 336; Doss v. Ditmars, 70 Ind. 451. See also *Richardson v. Upon assignment of a mortgage securing several notes, one of which is overdue, the assignee takes subject to any equities existing between the mortgagor and mortgagee in respect to the notes not due. Abele v. McGuigan, 73 Mich. 415.

Where the mortgagee retains the remainder of a series of notes, the assignee is entitled, as against the mortgagee, without regard to the order in which the notes held by the two parties mature. Anderson v. Sharp, 4 West. Rep. 443, 44 Ohio St. 280; Parkhurst v. Watertown S. E. Co. 6 West. Rep. 284, 107 Ind. 584. See State Bank v. Tweedy, 8 Blackf. 447; Hough v. Osborne, 7 Ind. 140; Davis v. Langsdale, 41 Ind. 390; Doss v. Ditmars, 70 Ind. 451; Bank of United States v. Covert, 13 Ohio, 240.

The assignment carries with it the right to payment from the proceeds of the land of the notes assigned in preference to those retained, though the assignment was made without recourse. Jenkins v. Hawkins, 34 W. Va. 799.

One of two notes assigned after maturity, the other assigned before maturity to another person, is extinguished where, between the assignments, the assignor takes in exchange a part of the mortgaged property worth more than the note assigned after its maturity. Massachusetts Loan & T. Co. v. Moulton (Iowa) Oct. 16, 1890.

Assignee of mortgage takes subject to equities.

The assignee of a mortgage takes it not only subject to all the equities existing between the parties to the instrument, but also to all equities which third persons could enforce against the assignor. Bush v. Lathrop, 22 N. Y. 535; Schafer v. Reilly, 50 N. Y. 61; Union College v. Wheeler, 61 N. Y. 86; Greene v. Warnick, 64 N. Y. 220; Crane v. Turner, 67 N. Y. 437; Westbrook v. Gleason, 70 N. Y. 23; Temple v. Whittier, 5 West. Rep. 144, 117 Ill. 232; Ranney v. Hardy, 1 West. Rep. 52, 43 Ohio St. 157.

And the Recording Act has no application to protect the assignee against a defense founded upon such equity. Frear v. Sweet, 118 N. Y. 454; Schafer v. Reilly, supra.

The assignee of a paid mortgage of real estate takes it subject to the defense that it has been paid, although it is not satisfied of record. Redin v. Branhan, 43 Minn. 238.

It is a general rule that the assignee of a chose in 13 L. R. A.

action takes it subject to all equities to which it would be subject in the hands of the assignor. United States v. Sturges, 1 Paine, 534; DeWolf v. Howland, 2 Paine, 333; Foot v. Ketchum, 15 Vt. 258, 40 Am. Dec. 679; Mott v. Clark, 9 Pa. 399, 49 Am. Dec. 599; Murray v. Ijlburn, 2 Johns. Ch. 441, 1 L. ed. 440; Kleeman v. Frisbie, 63 Ill. 484; Clute v. Robison, 2 Johns. 595; Willis v. Twambly, 13 Mass. 204; Olds v. Cummings, 31 Ill. 188; Davies v. Austen, 1 Ves. Jr. 249; Covell v. Tradesman's Bank, 1 Paige, 135, 2 L. ed. 590.

Although the assignee had no equitable notice of any equitable lien upon the mortgaged premises, the mortgagor may claim the same rights against him, as he could against the mortgagee. Hubbard v. Turner, 2 McLean, 534; 2 Hov. Frauds, 133; Norrish v. Marshall, 5 Madd. 481.

On general principles the mortgagor may claim the same rights against the assignee of the mortgage as he could against the mortgagee. A payment to the mortgagee, subsequent to the assignment, of which the mortgagor had no notice, will be allowed against the assignee. If the mortgagor have any set-off or mutual credit against the mortgagee, it is not affected by the assignment. Hubbard v. Turner, supra; Niagara Bank v. Roosevelt, 9 Cow. 419; 2 Hov. Frauds, 133; Norrish v. Marshall, supra.

But the assignee of a mortgage takes it discharged of the equities of persons not parties to it, of which he has no notice. Bigley v. Jones, 5 Cent. Rep. 674, 114 Pa. 510; Mott v. Clark, 9 Pa. 399; Pryor v. Wood, 31 Pa. 142.

So the rule that the assignee of a mortgage takes it subject to all equities to which it would be subject in the hands of the assignor does not embrace equities or defenses springing from default, or even fraud, of the assignor, committed subsequent to the assignment, and which had no existence and were simply possibilities at the time of the assignment. The rule excludes defenses and rights after the assignment. Bush v. Cushman, 27 N. J. Eq. 134; Cornish v. Bryan, 10 N. J. Eq. 146; Losey v. Simpson, 11 N. J. Eq. 253; Coster v. Griswold, 4 Edw. Ch. 374, 6 L. ed. 910; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. Pl. 238.

Nor does the rule include latent equities in favor of third persons in the subject involved in the assignment, of which he had no notice. While it is the duty of the purchaser to inquire of the mortgagor, he is not required to inquire of the whole world as to latent equities. Silverman v. Bullock, 98 Ill. 19; Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh, 597, 24 Am. Dec. 687; James v. Morey, 2 Cow. 298; Hovey v. Hill, 3 Lans. 172; Tison v. People's Sav. & Loan Assn. 57 Ala. 331; Livingston v. Dean, 2 Johns. Ch. 480, 1 L. ed. 457; Livingston v. Hubbs, 2 Johns. Ch. 513, 1 L. ed. 470; Mott v. Clark, 9 Pa. 399; Redfearn v. Fer- amount of his indebtedness to the plaintiff, for which the mortgage is held as collateral security, and that was the amount allowed in the decree of foreclosure. Assuming that the estate of N. S. Mowry holds both the right of the Waumbec Lumber Company, the original mortgagor, to redeem, and the right of W. G. R. Mowry to fulfill the condition of the assignment to the plaintiff by paying the indebtedness for which the mortgage note is held by the plaintiff as collateral security, these rights being acquired from W. G. R. Mowry, both the estate, and the creditors of the estate, are bound by the terms of the assignment of the mortgage to the plaintiff.

The motion to vacate the decree is based upon the claim that the assignment of the mortgage to the plaintiff was valid only to the extent of $3,975, the actual indebtedness of W. G. R. Mowry to the plaintiff at the time of the transfer, and that the stipulation in the assignment covering future indebtedness is repugnant to Gen. Laws, chap. 136, § 3, and inoperative. It is also claimed that the conveyances by Sinclair, June 29, 1880, and by McKean and Fletcher, December 31, 1880, to W. G. R. Mowry, the mortgagee, extinguished the mortgage title by merger, excepting as to the existing indebtedness of W. G. R. Mowry to the plaintiff. The fact that the assignment of the mortgage to the plaintiff covered future advances did not change the character of the debt secured by the mortgage. Section 3, chap. 136, Gen. Laws, provides that "no estate conveyed in mortgage shall be holden by the mortgagee for the payment of any sum of money, or the performance of any other thing, the obligation or liability to the payment or performance of which arises, is made, or contracted after the execution and delivery of such mortgage."

On discharge of debt mortgagee regarded as trustee.

The mortgagee or his assigns, after a discharge of the debt or liability, is regarded as a trustee for the mortgagor and his assigns, and holds the property, if at all, under an obligation to reconvey, and thus fulfill that resulting trust. Upham v. Brooks, 2 Woodb. & M. 413; Aymar v. Bill, 5 Johns. Ch. 570, 1 L. ed. 1178.

The assignee of a note and deed of trust securing the same is not authorized to appoint a new trustee, by a provision in the deed empowering the cestui que trust "or their legal representatives" to make such appointment. Fuller v. Davis, 63 Miss. 73.

A mortgagee who assigns the debt holds the legal title to the mortgage entirely for the benefit of the assignee, and retains no title which he can assert in any action or proceeding; and payment to the assignee revests all title in the mortgagor. Barnes v. Boardman, 3 L. R. A. 785, and note, 149 Mass. 106.

A mortgagee, or his assigns, is precluded by Ala. Code from claiming title under the mortgage, if the mortgage debt has been paid, although the mortgage and payment were made before the passage of the Act. Abbett v. Page (Ala.) May 20, 1891.

But a mortgagee cannot be required to release one of several lots covered by the mortgage, upon the payment of the proportionate share of such lot; but the whole amount of the mortgage must be paid by the owner of any lot who desires to redeem. Coffin v. Parker, 127 N. Y. 117.

A clause in an assignment of a mortgage, that it is "without recourse . . . in any event whatever," cannot prevent the assignor's liability for a fraudulent representation as to what had been paid to him upon the mortgage. Hexter v. Bast, 126 Pa. 52.

Evidence of payments made to a mortgagee, without suing the mortgagor, at times not specified, is insufficient to defeat the mortgage in the hands of an assignee under an assignment made by the mortgagee in his lifetime. Nau v. Brunette (Wis.) April 9, 1891.

Any assignee of a mortgage is liable to the penalty imposed by Neb. Comp. Stat., chap. 78, § 29, for refusal or neglect to execute a discharge after payment, although no formal assignment is made on the mortgage. Daniels v. Densmore (Neb.) May 8, 1891.

Priority among assignees.

The order of the respective assignments is wholly immaterial upon the rights of priority among the assignees. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 184; Winters v. Franklin Bank, 33 Ohio St. 250; Bank of United States v. Co-13 L. R. A.

If the assignee of a note first maturing delays in enforcing his security, even though the second and other subsequent notes should have become due and payable, his priority is not thereby lost. Lyman v. Smith, 21 Wis. 674; People's Sav. Bank of Evansville v. Finney, supra.

When a judgment at law has been recovered on a note by its holder, the judgment takes the place of the note in the order of priority under the mortgage. Funk v. McReynolds, 83 Ill. 481.

According to this rule it would be impossible for a holder of a note or notes first maturing, to foreclose the mortgage entirely, and by a sale of the premises cut off the rights of the other holders. An assignment of a certain share in a mortgage, with no agreement as to priority of lien, although the mortgage is for separate instalments, leaves the parties with equal claims and without preference. Jennings v. Moore, 83 Mich. 231.

The assignment of a mortgage given for an existing debt, as security for future advances, is not within the prohibition of the statute. The foreclosure proceedings are based upon the original mortgage debt, and the plaintiff is entitled, as against W. G. R. Mowry, the mortgagee, and assignor of the mortgage, and all parties deriving title from him with notice of the assignment, to a decree for the amount of its claims against W. G. R. Mowry, for which the mortgage, by the terms of the assignment, is held as collateral security, not exceeding the amount of the mortgage debt.

The claim that the mortgage debt became extinguished by merger is not sustained. By the assignment of the note and mortgage to the plaintiff, April 27, 1878, W. G. R. Mowry parted with his title as mortgagee, which he never regained; and, when he acquired the title of the mortgagor two years afterwards, there was no merger, because there was no union of estates.

Exceptions overruled.

Smith, J., did not sit. The others concurred.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

AMERICAN FREEHOLD LAND MORTGAGE CO. of London, Limited, App't., v.

William B. SEWELL et al.

(.....Ala.....)

1. A mortgagor who has conveyed the lands to a third person cannot exercise any election as to redemption from foreclosure sale.
2. A cross-bill for cancellation of a contract sued upon, on the ground of usury, must be dismissed if it fails to offer to do equity by paying principal and legal interest.
3. A loan is an Alabama contract when the application is made, the money paid over to the borrower, and the notes and mortgage executed in that State, although the debt is made payable in New York and the money was sent from that State to the mortgagee's agent in Alabama to be paid over on the execution of the papers.
4. Inconsistency or repugnancy of allegations is waived by failure to demur.

Messrs. Sample & Gunter for appellees

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Corbin Banking Company, doing business as bankers in New York City, negotiated a loan between the plaintiff, a corporation under the laws of England, and William B. Sewell, the defendant, a resident citizen of Alabama. The loan was secured by a mortgage on lands in Elmore County, Ala. Under a power of sale included in the mortgage, the land was sold, and plaintiff, the mortgagee, became the purchaser. By the laws of this State a foreclosure of a mortgage, in accordance with its provisions, is a valid, legal foreclosure, and, there being no fraud or undue advantage, is absolute and final against all persons except against the mortgagor or his privies, although the mortgagee himself is the purchaser at his own sale. A mortgagor (or his privies or assignees who have become such before a foreclosure) may disaffirm and avoid the sale and foreclosure when the mortgagee becomes the purchaser, no such authority having been granted in the mortgage, seasonably expressed. The mortgagee also may, by bill in chancery, compel the mortgagor to elect whether he will ratify or disaffirm the sale, and if the sale is disaffirmed, the bill being framed for that purpose, upon sufficient proof the court will decree a foreclosure. Acting under these principles, the plaintiff, having purchased the mortgaged lands at a sale made in pursuance of the terms of the mortgage, filed the present bill, in which the defendant is required to elect whether he will ratify or disaffirm, and, in the event he disaffirms the sale, the court is prayed for a decree of foreclosure. The mortgage and notes are headed at Elmore County, Ala., and purport to have been dated and signed there. By the averments of the bill the mortgage is made a part of the bill. It has this provision in it: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the notes herein described and this mortgage shall be governed and construed by and under the laws of the State of Alabama, where the same is made." The note, bearing 8 per cent interest on its face, and interest coupons, are made payable at the office of the Corbin Banking Company, New York City. The defendant William B. Sewell answered the bill, and elected to disaffirm the sale. In his answer he states "that the said transaction was made in the State of Alabama on the 5th day of March, 1887, or about that time;" and this admission is followed with the statement that Gaddis was the agent of the complainant, and acting in its behalf, doing business in this State; and that plaintiff had not complied with the Constitution and laws of the State prohibiting the doing of business by a foreign corporation in the State without having a known place of business and an authorized agent; and further averring there was usury in the transaction; and asked that the answer be taken as a cross-bill; and prayed for affirmative relief. In answer to the cross-bill, the plaintiff denied that the transaction was made in Alabama, but averred that the contract loan was effected wholly in New York; and, for further answer to the cross-bill, the plaintiff averred that defendant Sewell, after the filing of the original bill, and before filing his answer and cross-bill, had sold, by lease and quitclaim, all his interest in the land to one William H. Whetstone. A copy of the conveyance to Whetstone, with the certificate of acknowledgment, is made an exhibit to the answer to the cross-bill. Plaintiff then amended its original bill by adding thereto an averment that the contract loan was made wholly in New York City, and not in Alabama. To the bill as amended the respondents answered, admitting the averment of the amendment to be correct, and, by way of answer and plea, set up the New York Statute, which prohibits a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent and which declares all contracts in which usurious interest is charged to be null and void. The pleadings have been stated at length, in order that we may be the better understood in considering the several questions of law discussed and insisted upon in argument. The chancellor dismissed plaintiff's bill and defendants' cross-bill, holding that the contract was governed by the laws of New York, and was null and void.

The foreclosure of the mortgage by sale, under power given in the mortgage, cut off the equity of redemption, as fully as a foreclosure by a decree by the court. The mortgagor in such a case may come into a court of equity, and in this court alone, and have the sale set aside, and thus become reinvested with the equity of redemption. But to obtain this relief, he must offer to do equity. Garland v. Watson, 74 Ala. 324; Harris v. Miller, 71 Ala. 32; Craddock v. American L. & Mortg. Co. 88 Ala. 281; Alexander v. Hill, 88 Ala. 487; Ezzell v. Watson, 83 Ala. 120; Knox v. Armistead, 87 Ala. 511.

The purchaser of the equity of redemption succeeds to all the rights of the mortgagor. The court does not set aside the sale on the ground that the equity of redemption still exists in the mortgagor, but on the theory that the mortgagee stands in the relation of a trustee, who has obtained an advantage over his cestui que trust, and, out of great caution, a court of equity permits the cestui que trust to elect within a reasonable time whether he will disaffirm the sale. Thomas v. Jones, 84 Ala. 304. After the foreclosure there is no property right in the mortgagor; nothing that can be levied on or sold or assigned. We do not now refer to the statutory right of redemption amended by the Acts of 1888-89, p. 764, but to the redemption rights of the mortgagor growing out of the transaction under consideration. He has the option to ratify or disaffirm, and no one who was not the owner of the equity of redemption, or his privies, at the time of the foreclosure by sale, and who has not in some way estopped himself, can assert this election. The only purpose and effect of a decree setting aside the sale is to restore to him the equity of redemption, and this will be done only upon his doing equity. If, therefore, after the foreclosure of the mortgage, the mortgagor sells and conveys the lands to a third person, he is not in a position to ask the court to grant this relief, or to exercise any election in the matter. McCall v. Mash, 89 Ala. 487. If the bill had been amended under Chancery Rule 48, and averred that after the filing of the bill, and before the respondent filed his answer and cross-bill, the respondent had sold and conveyed the lands to William H. Whetstone, and the averments had been sustained by proof, we would hold that defendant was estopped from asserting the right of election, and complainant would have been entitled to a decree confirming the foreclosure; or complainant might have dismissed his bill without prejudice, and, the mortgage being valid and fully executed, could have successfully maintained a suit in ejectment for the recovery of the land, without interference by a court of equity, at the suit of the mortgagor. An answer is intended merely to bring forward a defense to the bill or cross-bill, as the case may be, and the only relief granted upon a mere answer is that the defendant be dismissed. If proof had been offered to sustain this ground of defense,—which we do not find in the record,—not having been charged in the bill, no affirmative relief on this ground could be granted, for the want of proper averment. It has been settled by numerous decisions that he who comes into a court of equity for relief must do equity, and this rule has been strictly applied in all cases when the complainant has applied to be relieved from a charge of usurious interest. The same rule is applied to a respondent who seeks affirmative relief by a cross-bill. When the respondent prayed in his cross-bill for the cancellation of the contract, failing to offer to do equity, by offering to pay the principal and legal interest, his cross-bill was without equity, and should have been dismissed. Fulton Bank v. Beach, 1 Paige, 429, 2 L. ed. 703; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 391; Mobile Branch Bank v. Strother, 15 Ala. 51; Hudnit v. Nash, 16 N. J. Eq. 553; Vanderveer v. Holcomb, 17 N. J. Eq. 87; Eskala v. Elmore, 50 Ala. 587; Rogers v. Torbut, 58 Ala. 525.

The important question is to determine what law governs the contract, and to do this the first inquiry is to ascertain the place of the contract. The facts in the case of Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co., 88 Ala. 277, were almost identical with those in the present case. In the second paragraph of the opinion in that case this court said: "The bill shows on its face with sufficient certainty that the notes and mortgage were presumptively executed and delivered in this State. They all bear date April 13, 1886, the notes and mortgage alike being dated in Alabama. There is contained, moreover, in the body of the mortgage this declaration: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the notes herein described and this mortgage shall be governed and construed by and under the laws of the State of Alabama, where the same is made;" the word, "made," as here used, obviously meaning "executed," and the latter word involves the act of delivery. The acknowledgment, moreover, taken before the notary, imports, in express words, that the grantor executed the mortgage on the day it bore date. . . . It was immaterial, therefore, that the notes were made payable in New York. The loan of the money and the taking of the security by mortgage were prima facie executed in Alabama."

The averments of the original bill in this suit are substantially the same. Does the proof sustain these allegations, or does it support the amendment to the bill, which alleges the transaction to have been executed in New York? There can be no doubt that the evidence fixes Alabama as the locus contractus. The presumption arising from the written instruments is fully sustained by the facts testified to by Gaddis, none of which are disputed in any way by the testimony of any other witness. The application for the loan was made in Alabama; the money was paid to the borrower in Alabama, upon the execution of the notes and mortgage, which was done in Alabama, and at the time of their execution and in consideration thereof. Prior to that time all that had been done was merely preliminary. Some of these preliminary acts, such as making out the application, had been performed in Alabama; others, such as the payment of the money by the loan company to the Corbin Banking Company, were done in New York. The Corbin Banking Company did not receive the money from the lender, or hold it as the agent of the borrower. As yet, the borrower had no claim upon it, and the Corbin Company was not responsible to the borrower for its use. The check sent out to Alabama was payable to Gaddis, not to Sewell, the borrower. It was to be paid over to the borrower after he had executed the contract by giving a note and mortgage upon the property designated in the application, and which was situated in Alabama; but, until this was done, there was no contract for the loan to Sewell, which Sewell could enforce against anyone. The negotiation ended in a contract when the note and mortgage were executed by Sewell. The proof shows that the note and mortgage were not made and sent to New York for delivery before the payment of the money, but the contrary is true. The money was sent out to Alabama before the execution of the notes and mortgage, and then and there paid over upon their execution. Until then the money was not subject to his order. Gaddis further testifies that, by previous arrangement with the Corbin Banking Company, he was paid in cash by the company, for his services in procuring the loan, 3 per cent on the amount loaned. He further says: "I received the mortgage and notes from said Sewell at the instance of the Corbin Banking Company of New York, and sent them to the Corbin Banking Company in New York." "I had the mortgage recorded after it was delivered to me."

Having arrived at the conclusion that the contract was made in Alabama, the stipulation to pay 8 per cent interest was in accordance with the lex loci contractus. If a valid contract where made, it is, as a general rule, valid everywhere. Under a valid contract, parties may agree for the payment of such rates of interest as may be allowed by the law of the place of making or performance of the contract. This proposition is conceded. Depau v. Humphrys, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 27; Andrews v. Pond, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 78, 10 L. ed. 67; 2 Kent, Com. § 460; Hanrick v. Andrews, 9 Port. (Ala.) 80; Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 24 L. ed. 681; Hitchcock v. United States Bank, 7 Ala. 433.

Proof without allegation, or allegation without proof, does not authorize relief. The allegata and probata must correspond, and both be sufficient. Are the pleadings in condition to entitle plaintiff to the benefit of the conclusion reached from the evidence as to the locus contractus? We have stated them as they appear in the record. The original bill averred that the contract was made in Alabama. By adding an amendment, it was averred that the contract was made in New York. The first averment was not stricken out. Both averments are in the bill, inconsistent and repugnant to each other as they are. The answer is in the same condition. The original answer to the original bill admitted and averred that the contract was made in Alabama, and the defense was usury, under the law of Alabama, and also that the contract was void, upon the ground that complainant had "no known place of business or authorized agent, as required by the Constitution and laws of Alabama." To avoid the effect of this defense, undoubtedly, the bill was amended so as to aver the contract was made in New York. To meet the force of the amendment made to the bill, respondent, both by answer to the amendment and plea, admitted and set up that the contract was made in New York, and pleaded the New York Statute, which declares contracts for a higher rate of interest than 6 per cent to be null and void. The original answer remains as first drawn, admitting and averring that the contract was made in Alabama. No objection was taken by either party for inconsistency in the pleadings. We know the distinguished counsel representing the parties to this cause did not overlook or fail to appreciate the condition of the pleadings. They were left in this condition, no doubt, intentionally. At the time the pleadings were framed, and when the cause was submitted for decree in the chancery court, no adjudication had been made by this court construing the constitutional and statutory provisions, which prohibited the doing of any business in this State by a foreign corporation without having "a known place of business and an authorized agent" in this State. Previous decisions of this court had declared the constitutional provision self-executing, and the learned counsel did not know and could not tell what was necessary to be done in order to comply with the constitutional requirement. Plaintiff evidently was preparing to meet whatever construction the court might place upon the evidence in construing the law in regard to foreign corporations, and respondents' object apparently was to force plaintiff to shipwreck in either aspect, and for this purpose admitted that the contract was made in Alabama, or in New York, as plaintiff might aver. If the proof showed that it was an Alabama contract, then respondents, for a defense, pleaded a non-compliance with the Alabama laws; if the proof showed that it was a New York contract, then defendants would insist that the contract was void under the New York Statute. Whether correct or not as to the purpose of counsel, the pleadings are as stated, and the rights of the parties under them as they are must be adjudicated. An amendment to a bill is a mere continuation, and the whole is but one bill. In the case of Lockett v. Hurt, 57 Ala. 200, the bill was filed in a double aspect—first, asserting a right to redeem lands under a sheriff's sale; and, second, asserting the invalidity of the sheriff's sale. This court held that the plaintiff was entitled to relief. In the case of Ray v. Womble, 56 Ala. 86, referring to the case of Lockett v. Hurt, supra, it was held that the inconsistency of the bill in the latter was not inquired into, because the assignments of demurrer did not embrace the cause of repugnancy in the bill. We hold that the failure of the defendants to demur to plaintiff's bill, or otherwise object to it, on account of inconsistent or repugnant allegations, was a waiver of the defect; and, if the proof shows that plaintiff was entitled to relief under either aspect of his case, the court below erred in not granting relief. Our conclusion has been that the locus contractus was Alabama, and that consequently the New York Statute was no defense.

We are further confirmed in our conclusion that plaintiff is entitled to relief by the leading authorities relied on by both appellant and appellees to sustain their respective contentions. The facts in the case of Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 627, 8 L. ed. 1128, were that Robertson, a citizen of New York, being in England, applied to Chapman for a loan of £800 to be secured by bond and mortgage on lands in New York. It was agreed that Robertson should return to New York and execute his bond and mortgage, and have the same recorded, and transmit it to complainant in England, and, upon receipt of the security, the £800 were to be deposited in London, with Robertson's bankers, for his use. On a bill filed in New York, the same defense was made as in the present case, viz., that the contract was made in England, and the money payable in England, and, being in violation of the Usury Laws of England, the contract was void. The court held that, the security being upon land situated in New York, the place of the domicile of the mortgagor, although the money was payable in England, the contract was governed by the laws of New York, and the plaintiff was granted relief. The conclusion of this decision has been followed in other courts, and adopted as a sound construction of the law applicable in such cases. Dugan v. Lewis, 12 L. R. A. 93, 79 Tex. 246; New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. McLaughlin (in MS., from Supreme Court of Georgia, October Term, 1890); Boone, Mortg. § 86; Hitchcock v. United States Bank, supra.

We are aware that the soundness of the reasoning in the decision in Chapman v. Robertson, supra, has been questioned, and Jones, in his work on Mortgages (vol. 1, §§ 660, 661), says it has been overruled. Most of the authorities which criticise the principle of law laid down, generally concede the correctness of the conclusion of the learned chancellor who rendered the decision in the case of Chapman v. Robertson. Judge Story (Conf. L.) in his criticism (sec. 298c), referring to the case of Chapman v. Robertson, says: "The decision itself seems well supported in point of principle; for the parties intended that the whole transaction should be in fact, as it was in form, a New York contract, governed by the laws thereof, and the repayment of the debt was there to be made." The italics are ours. There are no facts in the case, except those which arise from the making of the note and mortgage in New York, which authorize the assumption that the money was to be repaid in New York. The two differ as to the place of payment; Story holding it to be a New York contract, and consequently the place of payment presumptively was in New York; the former holding that, as no place of payment was fixed, the law fixed it in England; but further held that although, as a mere personal contract, it would be wholly inoperative until it was received by the lender in England, where the money was then to be deposited with the borrower's banker for his use, yet, on account of the character of the property, being real or heritable property, and the further fact that the mortgage was executed in New York upon property in that State, and being valid by the lex situs, which was also the law of the domicile of the mortgagor, it was the duty of the court to give full effect to the security, without reference to the Usury Laws of England, which neither party intended to evade by the execution of the mortgage upon the lands in New York. It is insisted by appellant that the rule declared in Chapman v. Robertson is fully sustained by principle and authority, and applies in the present case; and, on the other hand, it is insisted by appellees that Chapman v. Robertson is not based upon sound principles of law, has been overruled, and that Story's criticisms are well founded. We have cited both authorities, because both sustain our conclusion, so far as granting relief to plaintiff.

In the case of Hitchcock v. United States Bank, supra, the court, referring to the case of Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, held that the facts of the case were sufficient to fix New York as the locus contractus. It says: "There the facts were substantially the same as in the preceding case, with the additional fact (which also exists in this case) that a mortgage was executed by a debtor on lands lying in New York, the place where the contract was made, though to be performed in England." The court further held that "the cases cited from 8 Mart. (N. S.) [Depau v. Humphrys, supra], and 6 Paige are identical with this, and, in our opinion determine the law correctly." The italics are ours. If the principles declared in the case of Chapman v. Robertson are correct, it is the duty of this 13 L. R. A.

court to hold the security valid, without reference to the Usury Laws of New York. On the other hand, if the facts of the case in Chapman v. Robertson are sufficient to fix the locus contractus in New York, as held by Story, and by this court in 7 Ala., supra, then the facts of the case under consideration, as we have shown, are much more potent to fix the locus contractus in Alabama; and, this being established, it is conceded the parties could contract for either rate of interest, without regard to the Usury Laws of the place of payment. The case before us does not require an adjudication of the question whether, when the locus contractus and locus solutionis is wholly in the same State, and where usurious contracts are declared void by statute, and the debt is secured by a mortgage upon property in another State where a higher rate of interest is legal, the parties may legally contract for the higher rate. Anything we might say on this subject would be regarded as mere dictum, inasmuch as we hold the present contract to have been made in Alabama, and in this respect the conclusion of this court differs from that reached in the case of Dugan v. Lewis. The case of Dugan v. Lewis, supra, was very similar to the case under consideration, and, if the facts had been detailed literally, probably the two would be identical in all respects. The Texas case regarded New York as the locus contractus and locus solutionis, and followed Chapman v. Robertson, supra, citing other authorities sustaining it. Judge Henry, by whom the opinion in the Texas case was rendered, brings forward, as an additional argument, this proposition, founded upon the doctrine that the contracting parties have the right to stipulate for the rate of interest legal at either of the two loci. He says there is no reason why their making their contract in one State instead of in the other, nor why their making it payable in one instead of in the other, should have a controlling influence over the question. Doing either will, in the absence of other evidence, serve to show their purpose, and control the result. But not so when they otherwise distinctly provide, or when, from other facts, their intention can be more satisfactorily ascertained. The general rule is, the validity of a contract, is determined by the place of the contract, and the intention of the parties only looked to in construing the contract, or, as forcibly put in brief of counsel, the "venue of the agreement determines its validity, and not the venue of the intention." Cubbedge v. Napier, 62 Ala. 522. The necessities of trade, commerce, and progress may demand that the principle of mutatis mutandis be expanded and applied to other things "than names, offices, and the like." The evidence fails to establish that the plaintiff charged any higher rate of interest than 8 per cent. There is no evidence tending to show that plaintiff knew of, was connected with, or in any manner interested in, the commissions paid, or agreed to be paid, to Gaddis or the Corbin Banking Company to procure the loan. Guin v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. (Ala.) 8 So. Rep. 888; Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 101, 29 L. ed. 560. Under the recent decisions of Nelms v. Edinburgh A. L. Mortg. Co. (Ala.) and New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Ingram (Ala.), both in MS., the averments and proof show a compliance with the law which requires that foreign cor-

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Cornelia GILMAN, Reept.,

v.

Preble TUCKER, Appt.

(..... N. Y.)

1. A statute is void as depriving one of his property without due process of law which provides that if a title to real estate, purchased at execution sale, is, at the suit of the judgment debtor, adjudged void, the judgment shall be of no effect unless within twenty days the plaintiff pays to the purchaser at such sale or his grantee the amount of the bid, with interest and costs of defending the title acquired, and that, in the event of plaintiff's failure to pay, the title shall be valid in the grantee; especially so where the judgment debtor would derive no benefit from the payment because the annulment of the sale would revive the lien of the original judgment, and an assignee has a right to recover from his grantee the amount paid for the land.

2. Property rights are created by the rendition of a judgment, which the Legislature has no power to reach and destroy.

(October 6, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York, affirming an order of the Special Term, which denied his motion for an order declaring the judgment obtained by plaintiff to be of no force or effect because of plaintiff's failure to comply with the provisions of Code Civ. Proc., § 1440. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—The doctrine of caveat emptor applies to execution sales.

The doctrine of caveat emptor applies to every purchaser of real estate at a sheriff's sale on execution. Froet v. Yonkers Sav. Bank, 70 N. Y. 553; Freeman, Executions, 517, § 310; N. Y. Code, § 1440; N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 6; Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 209; Cooley, Const. Lim. 335; Woodcock v. Bennett, 1 Cow. 711; Day v. Bach, 87 N. Y. 56; Code Civ. Proc. § 1479; Place v. Riley, 98 N. Y. 1.

Section 1440 of the New York Code, as amended by § 2, chap. 681, of the Laws of 1881, has no application where relief is sought against a fraudulent act of the defendant. McIntyre v. Sanford, 2 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 306.

Reluctance of the court to annul a statute.

Courts are extremely reluctant to pass upon the constitutionality of a legislative enactment, and in an early case Mr. Justice Johnson, speaking for the New York Court of Appeals, said: "We ought not to pass upon the question of the constitutionality of a statute, unless the determination of the point is necessary to the determination of the cause." Free v. Ford, 6 N. Y. 176.

Courts, at least, are bound to respect what the people have seen fit to preserve by constitutional enactment, until the people are unwise enough to undo their own work. Allor v. Wayne County Auditors, 43 Mich. 76.

Before the judiciary can with propriety declare an Act of the Legislature unconstitutional, a case should be presented in which there is no rational doubt. Bank of Newbern v. Taylor, 1 Law Repos. 246; Ex parte M'Cullum, 1 Cow. 550; State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612, 35 Am. Dec. 44.

The determining of a question, involving the inquiry whether an exercise of power by the legislative department of the State is constitutional, is readily conceded to be not only a matter of delicacy, but of grave import, and demands the most deliberate and mature consideration. It should not, moreover, be decided but in cases of clear necessity, and where the character of the act done is in plain and obvious conflict with the Constitution. 18 L. R. A.

It has been aptly said to be an inquiry, "whether the will of the representatives, as expressed in the law, is or is not in conflict with the will of the people, as expressed in the Constitution." Lane v. Dorman, 4 Ill. 238, 36 Am. Dec. 543.

Where a judge is satisfied upon full consideration that an Act of the Legislature is contrary to the Federal Constitution, the supreme law which he is bound to obey, and which must prevail over any Act that comes in conflict and cannot stand with it, or is for any other reason invalid, he has no choice; and all that is left him is honestly and fearlessly to do his duty from the faithful discharge of which no upright judge can shrink if he would. On the other hand, a judge should not suffer himself to be betrayed to pronounce an Act unconstitutional or invalid on insufficient grounds, by a morbid apprehension that a contrary decision might be ascribed to the want of a just and proper sense of judicial duty. Regents of University v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 365, 81 Am. Dec. 72.

It is clear that statutes passed against plain and obvious principles of common right and common reason are absolutely null and void, so far as they are calculated to operate against those principles. Ham v. M'Claws, 1 Bay. 98.

Nor will a court listen to an objection made to the constitutionality of an Act by a party whose rights it does not affect, and who has therefore no interest in defeating it. People v. Benselsaer & S. R. Co. 15 Wend. 113, 30 Am. Dec. 33; Cooley, Const. Lim. 197.

A statute, it has been said, is judicially held to be unconstitutional, because it is not within the scope of legislative authority; it may either propose to accomplish something prohibited by the Constitution, or to accomplish some lawful, and even laudable, object, by means repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or of the State. Com. v. Clapp, 5 Gray. 97.

A law that is unconstitutional is so because it is either an assumption of power not legislative in its nature, or because it is inconsistent with some provisions of the Federal or State Constitution. Com. v. Maxwell, 27 Pa. 444, 456; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 211, and note.

Messrs. Esek Cowen and Charles J. Hardy, for appellant:

Section 1440 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not a violation of any constitutional provision of this State, or of the United States.

By it a party having paid and extinguished the debt of a defendant in an execution, on receiving a deed of the debtor's land, if the debtor resumes the title to the land, he must pay back the amount of the debt. In other words, the person paying the debt, in case of the failure of his title, is given a species of equitable lien on the debtor's land, and is not to be divested of the title by the debtor, unless that lien is paid.

See McIntyre v. Sanford, 89 N. Y. 684.

The Legislature may constitutionally pass laws which render valid and legal the doings of public officers who have exceeded their authority, although by said law individuals may be deprived of vested rights.

Smith, Com. on Const. Constr. 409.

Where the Legislature might, without any violation of the Constitution, have authorized certain conduct on the part of public officers, it may ratify and validate such conduct by a subsequent Act.

What is due process of law.

What constitutes due process of law has been exhaustively defined in Desty's Federal Constitution, at page 282. The term is construed to mean such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of the law permit and sanction. Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 8 Hun, 16, 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 119; Ex parte Ah Fook, 49 Cal. 402.

It simply requires that a person should be brought into court and have an opportunity to prove any fact for his protection. People v. Essex County Suprs. 70 N. Y. 229.

It means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice (Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 490; Rowan v. State, 30 Wis. 128; State v. Becht, 23 Minn. 413), a timely and regular proceeding to judgment and execution. Dwight v. Williams, 4 McLean, 586.

It generally implies and includes parties, judge, regular allegations, and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceedings (Den v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co. 50 U. S. 18 How. 272, 15 L. ed. 372; Huber v. Rely, 53 Pa. 112; Rees v. Watertown, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 122, 22 L. ed. 70; Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. The Legislature had power to regulate the form of the execution, and it also had power to regulate the remedy of parties aggrieved by defects of form.

In case of a void judicial sale, if the lien be a valid one and is based upon an equitable or legal obligation of the owner, it is just that he should reimburse the defendant to the extent to which he has been benefited by the discharge of the lien. This result may be reached by compelling the owner to make the payment as a condition of granting relief.

Where the Legislature has sought to compel the owner to pay that which he is under no moral or equitable duty to pay, the Statute has been pronounced void.

Madland v. Benland, 24 Minn. 372.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves the construction and constitutionality of section 1440 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended by chapter 681 of the Laws of 1881, relating to the sale, redemption and conveyance of real property sold on execution.

The questions arise upon the affirmance by the general term of an order of the special term, denying the defendant's motion to set aside and vacate a judgment entered herein for the plaintiff. No claim was made but that the judgment was regular and authorized by the evidence in the case, or that there was any statute or rule of law which required the court to set aside such judgment. The purposes of the Act referred to, if valid, do not require an order of the court to render them effective. The contention is that the defendant is entitled to the relief asked for, because the plaintiff did not, within twenty days after the recovery of the judgment, make certain payments to the defendant, in default of which the section referred to declares the judgment to be of "no force or effect." Even if it be conceded that the provisions of the Code are valid, it does not follow that the defendant is entitled, as of course, to the relief demanded. It is not required by the language of the Statute, and the court might well have said, in the exercise of its discretion, that the defendant should be left to the remedies which the Statute gave him, and that it would not determine the controversy in a summary way upon motion. But we are disinclined to dispose of the appeal on this point, as important questions are raised by the case, which, in the interest of justice, require an early disposition.

The evidence in the case shows that previous to the commencement of this action the defendant had, as a subsequent judgment creditor of the plaintiff, acquired the right to a deed from the sheriff, by the redemption from the purchaser, upon an execution sale, of a house and lot in New York belonging to the plaintiff, and she, believing the sale to have been unauthorized and illegal, brought this action to compel a determination of the defendant's claim under such redemption. In answer to the action the defendant set up title in himself through the proceedings to redeem from the former judgment creditor, who had bid it in on an execution sale upon a judgment in his favor against the plaintiff. The question litigated upon the trial was as to the validity of the execution upon which such sale was had. The trial court found that it was "a void process, and that, therefore, the sale under that void process was also void and of no effect, and therefore the defendant Tucker could and did take no valid title by reason of his redemption from a sale which was void." Place v. Riley, 98 N. Y. 1.

Judgment was therefore rendered in favor of this plaintiff, with costs, and that judgment was affirmed, not only by the general term, but also by this court, with costs. It is claimed that this judgment is ineffective, because the plaintiff did not within twenty days after its recovery, in compliance with section 1440, pay to the defendant the moneys required to be paid by that section. The section, as amended, read as follows: "The right and title of the judgment debtor, or of a person holding under him, or deriving title through him, to real property, sold by virtue of an execution, is not divested by the sale, until the expiration of the period within which it can be redeemed, as prescribed in this article and the execution of the sheriff's deed. But if the property is not redeemed and a deed is executed in pursuance of the sale, the grantee in the deed is deemed to have been vested with the legal estate from the time of the sale." Then follows the Amendment: "And if the title of such grantee, or his assignees, is adjudged, for any reason or cause whatsoever, to be null and void in any action for that purpose brought by the judgment debtor, or his assignees, such judgment shall have no force or effect, unless, within twenty days after the entry of such judgment, the plaintiff shall pay to such grantee, or his assignees, the sum of money which was paid upon the sale with interest from the time of the sale as prescribed in this article, including the costs and expenses of defendant in defending the action in which such judgment was recovered, to be adjusted by a judge of the court in which said action was brought; and in the event of plaintiff's failure to pay such purchase money and expenses within the time aforesaid, said title shall be valid in said grantee." It was also provided that if, in any pending action to recover such property, an appeal had been taken, the plaintiff should have twenty days from final judgment in his favor to make the payments required.

In considering the meaning and effect of the Amendatory Act, it is desirable to have in mind the previous condition of the law on the subject. The Code of Civil Procedure, which was a substantial re-enactment of the provisions of the Revised Statutes in respect to this subject, provided that on a sale of lands on execution the debtor's title should not be divested until fifteen months after the sale. This period was allowed him and his judgment and mortgage creditors to enable them to redeem from the sale. The first year was allowed to the debtor and the three succeeding months to the creditors entitled to the benefit of the redeeming Statute. On the expiration of the fifteen months, in case there was no redemption by the owner, the sheriff was bound to execute a deed of the premises to the purchaser on the sale, or to his assignees, or to the person entitled thereto under the provisions of the Statutes relating to redemption (§ 1471). Upon a redemption by the judgment debtor, or his heirs, executors, or assignees, the sale and certificates thereof became null and void and no conveyance therefore was required to be executed, as the judgment became satisfied to the extent of the sum collected and applied on the execution, and the title of the property sold remained in the judgment debtor (§ 1448). In case of a redemption by a judgment or mortgage creditor, he was required not only to pay the amount specified by the Statute to the person from whom he redeemed, but also to execute a satisfaction of his judgment or mortgage, stating that the redemption satisfies the judgment or mortgage in full, or to a specified amount (§ 1463). The purchaser of real property, sold by virtue of an execution, who has been evicted from the possession thereof, or against whom judgment is rendered in an action to recover the same in consequence, first, of any irregularity in the proceedings concerning the sale; or, second, if the judgment upon which the execution was issued, being vacated or reversed, or set aside for irregularity, or error in fact, may recover the purchase money paid by him, with interest, from the person for whose benefit the property was sold (§ 1479). In case of a sale upon a judgment based upon an "irregularity in the proceedings concerning the sale," the judgment under which the sale was made is revived and becomes valid to enable the judgment creditor to collect the sum paid on the sale, with interest (§ 1480). It is also provided that a judgment creditor, who completes proceedings for redemption, acquires all the right, title and interest in the property which the purchaser acquired by the sale (§ 1471). The protection which this scheme affords persons who have purchased land on an illegal sale is apparently sufficient for all of the requirements of justice or equity, independent of the amended section. Thus, when such sale is declared void, the security of the judgment creditor is restored for the purpose of enabling him to reimburse himself for the moneys paid on the sale, and a purchaser, on redemption, whose title is defeated for any of the causes specified, is authorized to recover the purchase money paid by him from the judgment creditor, or those who represent him.

These provisions gave an adequate and sufficient remedy to all of the parties interested where there had been an illegal sale on execution. The judgment creditor lost no rights by making such sale and the innocent purchaser and his assignees were protected, as well where the judgment was founded upon irregularities in the proceedings concerning the sale as when it had been reversed or vacated.

There could, of course, be no just foundation for a claim by the judgment creditor to be reimbursed by anyone when his judgment had, for any reason, been reversed or set aside, because in that event his claim would itself be extinguished and he would have suffered no loss.

A point is made by the respondent upon the language of the Act that the defendant, being a redeeming creditor, does not come within its terms. By the express language of the Act, its provisions would seem to be operative only where the land had not been redeemed. There can be no question, we think, but that, under the language of the Statute, the land had, within its meaning, been redeemed, and the defendant was therefore precluded from availing himself of its benefits. If this should be held to be the true construction of the Act, its operation would then be confined to those who purchased on the sale, and their assignees alone, and would thus exclude the defendant from the benefit of the Act. It is contended, however, by the appellant that a redeeming creditor comes within the spirit of the Act, and should therefore be held to be within its meaning.

We should be reluctant, under any circumstances, to extend by construction the scope and application of a statute which seems to be so uncalled for and inequitable as this, and particularly so when the redeeming creditor has an adequate remedy for any loss which he may have incurred; but where a party is excluded from the benefit of an Act by its express language the court is not at liberty to extend its operation by construction for the purpose of bringing him within its spirit. But, however this may be, we think that it is due to the gravity and importance of the questions raised that we should base our decision upon those more important points presented by the objections to the validity of the Amendment.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that the Act is predicated upon the existence of a final judgment determining, not only that the property to be affected has been illegally sold, but that it still belongs to the plaintiff therein, and that the defendant has no legal claim thereto, but also awards to the plaintiff the costs of the action, and, impliedly, holds that defendant is not entitled to such costs. The Act contains, therefore, the most ample concession that the party against whose rights it is aimed is, in law, the absolute owner of the property to be affected by the Amendment, and is a judgment creditor of the defendant to the extent of the costs included in the judgment. It then proceeds to declare how he may be divested of this title and property, and provides that, after recovering a judgment awarding him the title unless he pays, within a limited time, to the defendant an arbitrary sum, his property shall, by force of the Act alone, be transferred to his adversary.

The sole aim of the Statute thus seems to be to effect a change of title and to wrest from one person the property which has been finally adjudged to be his and vest it in another, by mere force of the legislative will. No obligation to make the payments referred to existed at law, and none was created by the Act, but it simply declared that unless they are made the defaulting party shall forfeit his property and it shall be transferred to another, who had neither legal nor equitable claim to it. In effect, it reverses the judgment and gives to one that which the courts have deliberately adjudged belongs to another.

The plaintiff contends that the Statute is unconstitutional, because it deprives the owner of his property without due process of law and we are of the opinion that the claim is well founded. It cannot be the subject of doubt, that an Act of the Legislature, which provides for an involuntary transfer of property from one person to another, without due process of law, whether with or without compensation, violates the principles of the fundamental law whatever may be the pretext upon which it is founded. It was said by Justice Jewett, in Embury v. Connor, 8 N. Y. 511, after a review of the authorities: "I think these decisions should be regarded as having settled the point that a statute is unconstitutional and void which authorizes the transfer of one man's property to another without the consent of the owner. although compensation be made." And it is laid down in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (p. 444), as an elementary principle, that a party cannot "by his misconduct so forfeit a right that it may be taken from him without judicial proceedings, in which a forfeiture shall be declared in due form. Forfeiture of rights and properties cannot be adjudged by legislative Acts, and confiscation without a judicial hearing after due notice would be void as not being due process of law."

The Act comes clearly within the spirit of our decision in Cromwell v. MacLean, 128 N. Y. 474, where Judge Peckham, in relation to a tax sale, says: "Holding, as we must, that no title or interest in fact passed to the purchaser at these tax sales, and that the original owner still retained his title, the effect of the Act in question, if valid, is by legislative fiat to transfer the title of the property of Edward C. Wilson, as trustee, to the lessees under three invalid leases."

Has the Legislature of this State the right to take the property of A and transfer it to B under the guise of confirming sales made of such land in invitum; but by which no title, in fact or in law, passed from the owner to the purchaser? The statement of the question should be its best answer. The property thus taken is not taken by due process of law.

What difference does it make to say that the Legislature is acting only in a way of validating proceedings to collect a tax, which, in justice, the owner of the land ought to pay? The answer is, that the proceedings have been so fatally defective that no title has passed, and the owner has his title to his property the same as if no proceedings had been taken. Where is the authority in such case for the Legislature to itself transfer the title of his property to someone else?"

It is obvious that if the Legislature could not directly confirm such sale, the court ought not to strain to discover such an illegal intention in the words of an Act, whose motives and purposes are ambiguous and indefinite.

Tested by these rules, we are unable to see how this Act can be supported and at the same time effect be given to the constitutional guaranty. It was said by Judge Earl, in Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, that "the constitutional validity of a law is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but by what may by its authority be done."

A consideration of the results which may be reached through the provisions of this Act, when construed according to the plain meaning of its language, demonstrates the impossibility of reconciling its provisions with the requirements of the fundamental law. The obvious intention of the Act is to take away from the owner all remedy for the recovery of his property, except upon the payment by him to his adversary of a sum of money which must frequently be greater than the value of the property itself. If he remains in possession of the property he is deprived of any remedy to protect his possession, and if his adversary has succeeded in obtaining possession, he is deprived of any remedy to recover it, except upon the condition that he pays as much, or more, than it is probably worth. An owner may, therefore, under this law, be stripped of his property under a void proceeding, be turned out of possession and denied any affirmative relief in the courts, unless upon the condition that he pays for the property its value, as determined by a judicial sale, and, in addition thereto, a sum for costs and expenses, the amount of which he has no means of ascertaining, and which may also exceed the value of the property in litigation.

A more effectual scheme to deprive an owner of his property could hardly be conceived. Whether he abandons it to the wrong-doer or elects to seek his remedy in the courts, the property as a subject of value has passed from him irrecoverably. It is not claimed by the appellant that the change of title, intended to be effected by this Statute, is to be produced by any process of law, or as the result of any judicial proceeding whatever; and the Statute in plain language declares that it shall take place as a consequence of the owner's successful attempt to establish his right through any action at law, upon a failure to make the payments required. The Statute is intended to execute itself and pass the title upon the expiration of the time limited by the Statute. One of the arguments by which the Statute is attempted to be sustained is the claim that the Legislature has, in effect, required the owner to repay certain sums of money which had theretofore been appropriated to her use, and inasmuch as she has had the benefit of the amount bid on the sale, it is argued that it is in accordance with equitable rules that he should be required to repay such sums before recovering back her property.

We do not think it is competent for the Legislature to deny, for any cause, a party who has been illegally deprived of his property, access to the constitutional courts of the State for relief. If, as we have seen, he is denied all remedy for the wrong inflicted upon him, the deprivation of his property becomes just as effectual as though it had been taken from him by direct legislative enactment. But, however this may be, the act does not seem to furnish any foundation for the argument. The plaintiff has never, in fact, been relieved from her liability to pay the original judgment, and has not derived any benefit from the attempted sale. That liability was revived against her in favor of the judgment creditor when she recovered judgment for the land, and no provision is made by the Act for the satisfaction of that lien, although the payment required by the Statute be actually made by her. The lien is given to one party and the payment is required to be made to another, and in the absence of any provision in the Statute making such payment a satisfaction it is difficult to see why the lien does not remain and the judgment stand unsatisfied.

The payment required was also unnecessary for the protection of the redeeming creditor, as he had his right of action to recover back the money paid by him from the person to whom it was paid. The section, as amended, thus secured to the judgment creditor, not only a lien on the land for the original debt, but leaves him in possession of an equivalent sum received from the redeeming creditor, and the redeeming creditor is entitled to receive not only the money required to be paid under this Statute by the owner, but also acquires a cause of action against the judgment creditor to recover back the money expended by him on redemption. Both of these parties, therefore, have, by this Act, double security for the same debt and no provision is made by the Statute that the payment required to be made by the owner shall satisfy any of these liabilities. It would therefore seem that, in fact, no benefit accrued to the plaintiff from the moneys paid on the sale, and no pretense was left for the requirement made by the Statute.

But a further answer to the claim is found in the fact that the Statute proceeds upon no such theory and purports to make no such application. No reference is made in it to the liabilities of the judgment debtor, or provision made for their satisfaction, and the sum required to be paid by her has no reference to the existence of any lien or debt, or its amount. Indeed, it requires the payment, as well when it has been judicially pronounced that there is no debt, as when one may, in fact, exist. The Act makes no distinction between cases where the judgment upon which the sale was made has been reversed and set aside, and those in which the process alone has been adjudged to be void. It wholly ignores any such distinction and requires the payment to be made, as well where no claim ever existed, as where a legal claim has been illegally attempted to be enforced. It furnishes no argument in favor of the legality of this Act, to say that some of the consequences following its enactment could, under special conditions, have been constitutionally produced, if provided for in some other way. The broad question here is, whether this enactment construed according to its plain meaning and intent, enables one person to acquire the property of another against his will, except by due process of law. If it does the courts must condemn it as violative of the fundamental law. The vicious purpose of the Act is so thoroughly interwoven with the whole scheme of the enactment as to render it impossible to eradicate its objectionable features without reconstructing the entire section. It is not, therefore, a case where any part of the Act can be supported.

We also think the Act violates the constitutional guaranty, because it assumes to nullify a final and unimpeachable judgment, not only establishing the plaintiff's right to the premises in dispute, but also awarding him a sum of money as costs. After rendition, this judgment became an evidence of title, and could not be taken from the plaintiff without destroying one of the instrumentalities by which her title was manifested. A Statute which assumes to destroy or nullify a party's muniments of title is just as effective in depriving him of his property as one which bestows it directly upon another (Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, and authorities there cited). In the one case it deposits the owner directly, and in the other renders him defenseless against any assault upon his property. Authority which permits a party to be deprived of his property by indirection is as much within the meaning and spirit of the constitutional provision as where it attempts to do the same thing directly. Even assuming that it might be lawful for the Legislature to impose a condition upon the right of a party to maintain a particular action to recover real property, no such case is here provided for. This Statute makes any action at law to establish his right subject to its provisions, and thus deprives him of all remedy for the wrong done him. It not only does this, but it attempts to reverse a judgment and give to the defeated party the fruits of a recovery awarded to another. We must bear in mind that a judgment has been rendered, and the rights flowing from it have passed beyond the legislative power, either directly or indirectly, to reach or destroy. After adjudication the fruits of the judgment become rights of property. These rights became vested by the action of the court, and were thereby placed beyond the reach of legislative power to affect.

We have been referred to no authority which justifies legislation taking such rights away arbitrarily, and we know of no theory upon which it can be sustained. Instances where land subject to a lien for taxes has been sold therefor, and the owner has been required to pay the taxes, as a condition of maintaining an action to recover the land, or the borrower of money, at usurious rates, is required to repay the sum equitably due before maintaining a suit in equity to enforce a forfeiture of the securities held by the creditor, are, obviously, not analogous to the case under consideration.

We are therefore of the opinion that the repugnancy between the law and the constitutional rights of the citizen is so irreconcilable that the law must fail.

Another serious objection to the law seems to exist in the ambiguity of the provisions relating to the time limited for making the payments required by it. The language of the Statute requires the payment to be made within twenty days after judgment, and the subsequent portions of the section, providing that in case of pending appeals the payment might be made within twenty days after final judgment, would seem to imply that, in other cases, the time must be limited by the original judgment. If this be so it might be that a defendant, by taking an appeal and staying proceedings, could defeat any effort of the owner to make the payments, and thus compel him to lose his land although he might be willing to comply with the statute. This seems to show the recklessness with which the owner's interests were regarded and the injustice which may be perpetrated under its provisions.

It is not without a feeling of satisfaction that we have found this amendatory Statute unconstitutional, for in every view in which it may be considered, it impresses us with the conviction that it is grossly inequitable and unjust. We can discover no reason in the situation of the purchaser at an illegal execution sale under the existing law which justifies the adoption of the careless, ill-considered and inequitable provisions which distinguish this legislation.

The amended section is subject to many other criticisms, which we have not felt called upon to make, as those already referred to fully justify the conclusion we have reached in the case.

The order should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

George W. HUBBLE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

M. A. E. COLE.

(.....Va.....)

Damages to a tenant, resulting from an injunction obtained without sufficient cause by the lessor, which prevented him from cultivating the land, may be recovered in an action on the covenants in the lease, although there may also be a remedy on the injunction bond.

(July 9, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Smyth County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach by defendant of covenants contained in a lease which she had executed and delivered to plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. S. Blair for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Buchanan & Buchanan, for defendant in error:

The remedy for injury or damage resulting from an injunction in this State is upon the injunction bond.

Va. Code 1887, § 3442.

No action can be maintained for instituting a civil suit unless it was done maliciously and without probable cause.

4 Minor Inst. pt. I. pp. 482, 483.

We have no case, so far as we can ascertain, where damages have ever been allowed for injuries resulting from an injunction except upon or by reason of the bond and the statute which requires it.

See Gorton v. Brown, 27 Ill. 489, 81 Am. Dec. 245.

Could any other action be resorted to by the injured party he would then have two actions, one on bond, and case, or covenant for damages, and thus be enabled to split his action, which is not permissible.

See 7 Rob. Practice, 177, note 81; Bender-nagle v. Cocks, 19 Wend. 207, 82 Am. Dec. 448.

Should no bond be given or condition imposed by the court, and the injunction be granted, the resulting injury would be the act of the court, and therefore damnum abque

NOTE.—Injunction granted with caution.

A preliminary injunction frequently operates as a decision of the whole question, and should not be granted where other remedies suffice. Burch v. Cavanaugh, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 410.

It should be issued with caution, and, so to speak, reluctantly, and only in a case reasonably free from doubt. Higginson v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 22 Hun, 479; Woodward v. Harris, 2 Barb. 489; Van Veghten v. Howland, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 461; Ramsey v. Erie R. Co. 38 How. Pr. 183; Redfield v. Middleton, 7 Bosw. 649; Gurnee v. Odell, 13 Abb. Pr. 264; Roberts v. Mathews, 18 Abb. Pr. 199; Brooklyn C. & J. R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 33 Barb. 420; Central Cross Town R. Co. v. Bleecker St. & F. R. Co. 49 How. Pr. 233.

It should not be granted in every case in which plaintiff brings himself within the letter of the rules allowing the issuance of the writ. Regard should be had to the nature and extent of the injury which plaintiff would suffer if the injunction should be withheld, and also to the consequences to defendant if granted. Bruce v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 19 Barb. 371; Gallatin v. Oriental Bank, 16 How. Pr. 233; McCaferly v. Glazier, 10 How. Pr. 475.

It should not be granted in every instance of a prima facie case of probable right to a final injunction, but only in cases where without it the court cannot by its judgment do justice between the parties. Van Veghten v. Howland, supra.

It should not be granted where all the equities are disapproved. Central Cross Town R. Co. v. Bleecker St. & F. R. Co. supra.

It should only be granted where it appears by the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and where it also appears by affidavit that sufficient ground exists therefor. Fowler v. Burns, 7 Bosw. 637. See Hascall v. Madison University & B. E. Soc. 8 Barb. 174.

Statutory conditions must be complied with.

Where a statute requires the giving of a bond as a condition precedent to the granting of an injunction, the court is not at liberty to disregard such statute; and it is error, in such case, to grant the injunction without the required bond. Miller v. Parker, 73 N. C. 58.

But the bond must be construed and governed by the statute in force at the time of its execution, and a statute then enacted, but which does not take effect until after such execution, cannot have a retroactive operation so as to affect a bond given prior thereto, since the question is one which goes to the contract itself and not merely to the remedy thereon. Mix v. Vail, 38 Ill. 40.

But in the absence of any statute prescribing the conditions of the bond, it rests in the discretion of the court to fix the terms upon which the relief may be granted, and where plaintiff gives such bond as is required by the court, and fails to prosecute his suit successfully, he is liable for all damages sustained by reason of the injunction. Newell v. Partee, 10 Humph. 325; Foster v. Shephard, 33 Tex. 687; 2 High. Inj. § 1620.

Bond must indemnify for damages sustained.

The recitals of an injunction bond may vary somewhat in phraseology, but the pivotal idea remains the same—they all aim to protect the defendant against loss or damage by reason of the injunc-injuria, unless the injunction should be sued out maliciously and without probable cause.

Lacy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Smyth County, rendered at the March Term, 1890. The action is covenant, and the declaration set forth that on the 30th day of December, 1881, in the County of Smyth, the defendant leased for the term of five years to the plaintiff, in consideration of the sum of $3,000, to be paid to her as stated in the deed of lease executed by them, certain real estate situated in the said county, with conditions stated and set forth in said deed; that the plaintiff performed all the covenants of the said deed on his part, but that the defendant did not perform on her part, setting forth the breaches, and by injunction prevented the plaintiff from cultivating the land, etc., and deprived him of the use and profit of the said land mentioned in the declaration from the 28th day of November, 1883, until after the expiration of the lease; that the said injunction was by decree of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia dissolved, and the bill dismissed; and laid his damages at $4,500. The defendant demurred to the declaration, which demurrer the court sustained, and rendered judgment for the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiff applied for and obtained a writ of error to this court. The ground of the court's decision is that the common-law action of covenant will not lie when the alleged breach was by legal process, as by injunction; that, when damage was caused, and the injunction not sustained, the injunction bond furnished the only remedy, all others being merged therein. Mr. High says (High, Inj. § 1648): "Some conflict of authority exists as to whether a defendant in an injunction suit may, by an action on the case, recover damages for having been enjoined without cause; and the rule has been broadly stated that no such right of action exists. The better doctrine, however, seems to be that defendant's right of action at common law is not merged in the remedy upon the bond, and that an action in the case will lie,"—citing Cox v. Taylor, 10 B. Mon. 17. Mr. Barton says, in his Chancery Practice (p. 478): "The right to damages upon the dissolution of an injunction is independent of any statutory provision upon the subject, and amid some conflict of the decided cases it is said that this right is cumulative of, and in addition to, the right of action at law upon the injunction bond. While the court decrees damages upon the dissolution, it cannot go beyond the injunction bond, so far as the penalty is fixed therein, and, when damages have been thus awarded, the decree of the court is conclusive as to the amount which can be recovered in an action on the bond; but not so the right of action on the contract, whose covenants have been broken." Mr. Lawson says (Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 3704): "It is now held that the defendant in an injunction suit has a common-law right of action to recover damages for having been improperly enjoined, in addition to his remedy upon the tion, if the court should finally decide that the plaintiff was not entitled thereto. Allen v. Brown, 5 Lans. 511.

Damages cannot be recovered beyond the amount specified in the undertaking on which the injunction is obtained. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Toll, 10 N. Y. Week. Dig. 269, affirmed 85 N. Y. 646.

Where a preliminary injunction is vacated upon stipulation, the sureties on the undertaking are only relieved from liability for damages accruing subsequent to the time of its vacation; they are still liable for all damages which accrued prior thereto the same as if it had been vacated on motion or by a decision of the court. Dickerson v. Hermann, 10 N. Y. Week. Dig. 268.

What damages may be considered.

The loss of the use and rental of the premises during the time defendant was enjoined is a proper element of damages to be recovered in an action upon the bond. Smith v. Wells, 46 Miss. 64; Hogmer v. Campbell, 86 Ill. 572; Richardson v. Allen, 74 Ga. 719. But see Hill v. Hill, 59 Vt. 125.

So, too, damages for the crops which defendant was prevented by the injunction from harvesting may properly be allowed (Allen v. Brown, 5 Lans. 511), as well as waste committed upon the premises while defendants were deprived of their possession by the injunction. Richardson v. Allen, supra; 2 High, Inj. 3d ed. § 1673.

The damages which the enjoined party may be entitled to for losses and injuries sustained by the operation of the writ are as various as the subjects which may be affected by such restraint. These damages, however, are ascertained and measured by the principle of giving just and adequate compensation for actual loss, which is the natural and proximate result of the injunction. Bullock v. Ferguson, 30 Ala. 227; Collins v. Sinclair, 51 Ill. 223; Hale v. Meegan, 39 Mo. 272; Brown v. Tyler, 34 Tex. 168; Moulton v. Richardson, 49 N. H. 70; Hord v. Trimble, 1 Litt. 413.

If the restraint keeps the owner of the property out of possession, or deprives him of its use, the compensation is given upon the same principle as in other cases of wrongful deprivation. Where a party was prevented from enjoying the benefit of his real estate by injunction which was obtained without cause, the value of the use and occupation was given (as damages. Rutherford v. Moore, 24 Ind. 311; Fleming v. Bailey, 44 Miss. 132. See Sturges v. Knapp, 36 Vt. 439; 2 Sutherland, Dam. 60.

The only liability created by an injunction bond is for such damages as are actually sustained by the wrongful suing out of the injunction. Staples v. White, 88 Tenn. 30.

The dissolution of an injunction is prima facie evidence that the defendant has sustained damages. Lemeunier v. McCleary, 41 La. Ann. 411.

In a suit upon an injunction bond conditioned "for the payment of any decree or order that may be awarded . . . and all such costs and damages" the penalty of which, with interest, is less than the amount for which the obligor became liable, plaintiff may recover the whole penalty, with interest to the date of the judgment, and that aggregate to carry interest after the date of the judgment. State v. Purcell, 31 W. Va. 44.

Upon a proceeding to ascertain the damages sustained by a party in consequence of an injunction restraining him in the exercise of some legal right, it is proper to allow the expenses incurred upon a reference. Holcomb v. Rice, 119 N. Y. 598.

bond." Mitchell v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 398; Manlove v. Vick, 55 Miss. 567; Gorton v. Brown, 27 Ill. 489; Iron Mountain Bank v. Mercantile Bank, 4 Mo. App. 505; Hayden v. Keith, 32 Minn. 277.

In some of the States this matter is regulated by statute, and it is provided by law that before decree defendant may file his account for all damages, and have them in that suit allowed; but when there is no specific mode prescribed by the statute of assessing damages, and no such provision exists by statute, the right of action at law is in addition to the remedy upon the bond. The declaration states a good cause of action, and the demurrer should have been overruled. The defendant was undoubtedly bound by her deed; and if, without sufficient cause (and the dissolution of the injunction and dismissal of the bill is conclusive of that), the defendant deprived the plaintiff of the benefits and profits accruing to him thereunder, she should undoubtedly respond in damages.

The judgment appealed from is erroneous, and the same will be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had therein, when the demurrer must be overruled, and the case proceeded in to final judgment upon the merits.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

WHITE SEWING MACHINE CO.

v.

Milo H. DAKIN et al., Appts.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The interlineation of an agreement to pay attorneys' fees in that clause of a bond to secure an agent's possible indebtedness to his principal, in which the obligors bind themselves to pay the penalty which has been fixed at a definite amount, is not a material alteration which will avoid the bond, under a statute providing that in suits on such bonds if a breach is found to exist the jury shall assess the damages, after which judgment shall be entered for the penalty and execution issued for the damages assessed.

2. Alteration of a bond after execution, by an agent of the obligee without authority, express or implied, will not avoid it.

(July 23, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Saginaw County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a penal bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hanchett, Stark & Hanchett, for appellants:

If made with fraudulent intent the alteration of this bond, even if immaterial, will discharge the sureties.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 568.

If Mr. Van Ness, acting for the White Sewing Machine Company, inserted the words "attorneys' fees" after the execution of the bond without the knowledge and consent of the defendants, intending thereby to produce some benefit to the Company, his act was a fraud on the defendants, even though the insertion of the words in no way changed their liability, or affected the instrument.

Adams v. Frye, 8 Met. 108; Van Brunt v. Eoff, 35 Barb. 501; Turner v. Billagram, 2 Cal. 523.

Any material alteration made in this instrument without the consent of the defendants after they executed it discharges them from liability.

NOTE.—Party producing instrument must account for alterations.

The party producing a writing as genuine which has been altered, or appears to have been altered, after its execution, in a part material to the question in dispute, must account for the appearance of alteration. He may show that the alteration was made by another, without his concurrence, or otherwise properly or innocently made, or that the alteration did not change the meaning or language of the instrument. If he do that, he may give the writing in evidence, but not otherwise. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1932.

Evidence tending to show that the alteration or erasure was made by a stranger to the instrument is always competent as by intendment of law, where such appears to be the case, and there is no procurement or connivance by either party, an alteration or erasure does not avoid the instrument. Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227; Ford v. Ford, 17 Pick. 418; Davis v. Carlisle, 6 Ala. 707; Piersol v. Grimes, 30 Ind. 129, 35 Am. Dec. 673; Crockett v. Thomson, 9 Sneed, 342; Boston v. Benson, 12 Cush. 61; Nichols v. Johnson, 10 Conn. 192; Lewis v. Payn, 8 Cow. 71, 18 Am. Dec. 427; Bigelow v. Stilphen, 35 Vt. 521; Boyd v. McConnell, 10 Humph. 68; Croft v. White, 23 Miss. 455; Lubbering v. Kohlbrecher, 22 Mo. 596; Lee v. Alexander, 9 B. Mon. 25, 48 Am. Dec. 412.

The material alteration of a written instrument 13 L. R. A. without the knowledge or consent of the maker renders it absolutely void, even in the hands of an innocent holder. Angle v. Northwestern L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 330, 23 L. ed. 556.

Some cases hold that in the case of a deed any alteration, whether material or not, avoids it. Den v. Wright, 7 N. J. L. 212; Wallace v. Harmstad, 15 Pa. 462, 53 Am. Dec. 608.

If the alteration is noted in the attestation clause, it is sufficient. If it appears in the same ink and handwriting with the body of the instrument, it may suffice. If the alteration is against the interest of the party claiming under the instrument, it is presumed properly made. Bailey v. Taylor, 11 Conn. 531.

Generally speaking, if nothing appears to the contrary, the alteration will be presumed to be contemporaneous with the execution of the instrument. Trowel v. Castle, 1 Keb. 23; Fitzgerald v. Fanconberge, Fitzg. 207, 213; Bailey v. Taylor, 11 Conn. 531, 534; Gooch v. Bryant, 13 Me. 388, 390; Pullen v. Hutchinson, 25 Me. 249, 254.

The general rule is that where any suspicion is raised, as to the genuineness of an altered instrument, whether it be apparent upon inspection or is made so by extraneous evidence, the party producing the instrument and claiming under it is bound to remove the suspicion by accounting for the alteration. Exceptions to the rule undoubtedly People v. Brown, 2 Dougl. 9; Wait v. Pomeroy, 20 Mich. 425; Holmes v. Trumper, 22 Mich. 427; Miller v. Finley, 26 Mich. 249; Bradley v. Mann, 37 Mich. 1; Aldrich v. Smith, Id. 468.

The alteration makes a provision for an attorneys' fee, and this renders void the entire clause providing for an additional 10 per cent.

Bullock v. Taylor, 39 Mich. 137; Meyer v. Hart, 40 Mich. 517, 522.

The insertion of these words, then, effected a material alteration of the contract, and although the change was favorable to the defendants they are released from liability.

People v. Brown, supra; Brandt, Suretyship, § 338; Hewins v. Cargill, 67 Me. 554.

Mr. John M. Brooks, for appellee:

The entire provision for the 10 per cent in case of suit, with or without the words "attorneys' fees," is absolutely void. In either case, the purpose is to impose upon the obligors the cost of possible litigation, and an agreement to pay more than the taxable costs is void.

Bullock v. Taylor, 39 Mich. 137; Myer v. Hart, 40 Mich. 517-522; State v. Taylor, 10 Ohio, 378; Shelton v. Gill, 11 Ohio, 417; Martin v. Belmont Bank Trustees, 13 Ohio, 258.

Such provision being void, the insertion of the words, "attorneys' fees," if made after the execution of the bond, would not be a material alteration, as it would not change the liability of the obligors.

Miller v. Finley, 26 Mich. 249-253, affirmed in Gano v. Heath, 36 Mich. 441; Leonard v. Phillips, 39 Mich. 132; Goodenow v. Curtis, 33 Mich. 505, 509; First Nat. Bank of Port Huron v. Carson, 60 Mich. 432, 437; Weaver v. Bromley, 8 West. Rep. 190, 65 Mich. 213.

A material alteration, if made by one having authority, avoids an instrument, while an immaterial alteration does not; and the intent is unimportant.

Phoenix Ins. Co. 25 Iowa, 430, 435; Leonard v. Phillips, Goodenow v. Curtis and Weaver v. Bromley, supra.

An agent to sell goods and receive and transmit the price to his principal, is not the agent of his principal to alter a note so received; and an alteration by him is simply deemed a spoliation.

Bigelow v. Stilphen, 35 Vt. 521; Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on a bond given by Milo H. Dakin as principal, and Aaron T. Bliss and Anthony Byrne as sureties, to the plaintiff, to secure any indebtedness incurred by Dakin to the plaintiff while acting as its agent in selling sewing machines. In January, 1888, Mr. Van Ness, an agent of the plaintiff, employed to procure dealers in the White sewing machines, made a contract with the defendant Dakin, by which Dakin was given the exclusive right to deal in White sewing machines within certain territory. It is the custom of the plaintiff to require dealers to give a bond to secure the company on any indebtedness to them which may be incurred by such dealers. Blank forms are furnished by the company and are filled out by Van Ness when needed. Mr. Dakin signed the bond in this case, and obtained the signatures of the defendants Bliss and Byrne as sureties, and delivered it to Mr. Van Ness, who forwarded it to the plaintiff. The formal part of the bond, before stating the conditions, reads as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that Milo H. Dakin, Aaron T. Bliss and A. Byrne are hereby held and firmly bound, severally and individually, unto the White Sewing Machine Company in the sum of one thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to the White Sewing Machine Company, their repre-ly arise, as where the alteration is properly noted in the attestation clause, or where the alteration is against the interest of the party deriving title under the instrument. Smith v. United States, 39 U. S. 2 Wall. 219, 17 L. ed. 788.

The party who produces an altered instrument is generally bound to explain the alteration or erasure, if it is in a material point. Jackson v. Osborn, 2 Wend. 555; Chappell v. Spencer, 23 Barb. 584.

This is especially the rule where the alteration is suspicious, and is beneficial to the holder. Tillou v. Clinton & E. Mut. Ins. Co. 7 Barb. 564; Acker v. Ledyard, 8 Barb. 514; O'Donnell v. Harmon, 3 Daly, 424.

The instrument, with all the circumstances of its history, its nature, the appearance of the alteration, the possible or probable motives to the alteration, or against it, and its effects upon the parties respectively, ought to be submitted to the jury; and the court cannot presume, from the mere fact that an alteration appears on the face of the instrument, whether under seal or otherwise, that it was made after the signing. Maybee v. Sniffen, 2 E. D. Smith, 1, 10.

The party introducing or offering in evidence a deed that has been altered by erasure or interlineation must show that the alteration was made before delivery. Jordan v. Stewart, 23 Pa. 244.

But it has been held that the presumption, in the first instance, is, that the alteration apparent on its face was made before execution, so that it will be 18 L. R. A.

admitted in evidence without any proof on the subject. Printup v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 558; Boothby v. Stanley, 34 Me. 115.

The nature of the alteration should doubtless be considered in determining whether the party offering the instrument is bound to give evidence explaining the alteration. If the alteration make the deed more favorable to the party producing it, that alteration becomes suspicious and must be explained; while in other cases no explanation need be given. Huntington v. Finch, 3 Ohio St. 445; Wilde v. Armsby, 6 Cush. 314.

If the alteration be merely verbal and immaterial, it will not affect the instrument, though made after delivery. Arnold v. Jones, 2 R. I. 345; 3 Phillips, Ev. 388, note.

It is not every alteration that will destroy an instrument. In order to produce that effect the alteration must be material. Flint v. Craig, 39 Barb. 319. And the weight of adjudication inclines to the view that an alteration obviously non-prejudicial in its nature will not vitiate the instrument. Sip v. Huey, 3 Ark. 93; Hornby v. Matcham, 16 Sim. 325; People v. Muzzy, 1 Denio, 239; Dunn v. Clements, 52 N. C. 58; Pequawket Bridge v. Mathes, 8 N. H. 136; Lanndon v. Paul, 20 Vt. 217; Nichols v. Johnson, 10 Conn. 192.

For further authority upon this subject, see notes to Wilson v. Hayes (Minn.) 4 L. R. A. 196; Palmer v. Poor (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 469, and Sanders v. Bagwell (S. C.) 7 L. R. A. 742.

sentatives or assigns; for which payment (together with 10 per cent attorneys' fees thereon in case of suit on this bond) well and truly to be made, they bind themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, and separate estates, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents. Sealed with their seals. Dated the twenty-fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight." Then follows the condition of the bond, which was to pay, or cause to be paid, any and every indebtedness or liability then existing, or which may thereafter in any manner exist, or be incurred on the part of Milo H. Dakin to the White Sewing Machine Company, etc. The words "attorneys' fees" appear to have been interlined in the bond between the words "10 per cent" and the word "thereon." The only questions presented by the record are: first, was the insertion of the words "attorneys' fees" a material alteration, if inserted after the bond was executed? Second, if inserted by Van Ness after it was executed, and before it was forwarded by him to the plaintiff for acceptance or rejection, did it render the bond invalid in hands of the plaintiff?

Clearly the alteration by the insertion of the words "attorneys' fees" was immaterial. An alteration, to be material, must be in a material part of the instrument, and affect the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto. Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 505. This instrument is not a money bond, and the action upon it is regulated by the Statute, which provides that, "when an action shall be prosecuted in any court of law, upon any bond for the breach of any condition other than for the payment of money, or shall be prosecuted for any penal sum for the non-performance of any covenant or written agreement, the plaintiff, in his declaration, shall assign the specific breaches for which the action is brought." And "upon the trial of such action, if the jury find that any assignment of such breaches is true, and that the plaintiff should recover damages therefor, they shall assess such damages, and shall specify the amount thereof in their verdict, in addition to their finding upon any other question of fact submitted to them." And "in every such action, if the plaintiff recover, the verdict of the jury, assessing the plaintiff's damages, shall be entered on the record, and judgment shall be rendered for the penalty of the bond, or for the penal sum forfeited, as in other actions of debt, together with the costs of suit, and with a further judgment that the plaintiff have execution to collect the amount of damages so assessed by the jury; which damages shall be so specified in such judgment." 2 How. Stat. §§ 7737-7739. The penalty of this bond is $1,000, no more and no less, and no recovery can exceed that amount. Bishop v. Freeman, 42 Mich. 583; Odd Fellows v. Morrison, 42 Mich. 523; Spencer v. Perry, 18 Mich. 394. The damages, including the interest, where it is proper to allow it to be assessed under the conditions, cannot exceed the penalty; and, if they equal the penalty, they can only draw interest from the date of the judgment. In this case, as in the other cases under the Statute, the recovery and judgment would be for the penalty of the bond, and the further judgment that the plaintiff have execution for the damages assessed. The promise to pay 10 per cent as attorneys' fees is no part of the penalty of the bond, and by no possibility can it affect the judgment to be rendered upon the bond, nor the amount of damages to be assessed.

Second. If any alteration was made after the execution of the bond, it was done by Van Ness, and although he was the agent of the plaintiff, and received and forwarded the bond in question to the plaintiff for its approval or rejection, yet there is no testimony in this record tending to show that he was expressly or impliedly authorized to make any alteration in the bond. The rule of law is that, when an alteration is made by a third party, it is an act of spoliation, and the alteration, although material, cannot invalidate the written instrument; and, when the spoliation is done by the agent of one of the parties, it will not avoid the contract, if the agent had no express or implied authority to do it. 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 505; Van Brunt v. Eoff, 35 Barb. 501; Collins v. Makepeace, 13 Ind. 448; Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227; Bigelow v. Stilphen, 35 Vt. 521; Miller v. Reed, 3 Grant, Cas. 51, 27 Pa. 244; Terry v. Hazlewood, 1 Duvall, 104.

The declaration counts upon the bond as being in a penalty of $1,000, and assigns breaches of the conditions. It follows that the bond would be a valid instrument in the hands of the plaintiffs for what it was before the alteration was made.

The errors assigned must be overruled, and the judgment affirmed, with costs in both courts. The other Justices concurred.

v.

BLACKSTONE NATIONAL BANK.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A pledge of securities as collateral for a note which authorizes their sale "on the non-performance" of the promise, and the application of the proceeds to pay the note, and makes the surplus applicable "to any other note or claim" held by the pledgee against the pledgor, is an absolute pledge of the securities for such other notes or claims, the right to enforce which does not depend on non-payment of the principal note.

2. Failure to pay the whole of a demand note when demanded, or to procure the extension of the balance as a time loan, is a breach of an agreement to pay on demand, within the meaning of a provision in a pledge of collaterals that in the event of such breach their surplus, after satisfying the note, may be applied to other demands against the maker; and the fact that the holder has agreed not to press the demand without further notice is immaterial.

NOTE.—See note to Fall River Nat. Bank v. Slade (Mass.) 12 L. R. A. 131.

3. Claims against the firm of which the maker of a note is a member are included in a provision in his pledge of collaterals to secure the note that, on his failure to pay it when due, any excess of the collaterals may be applied to "any other note or claim" held against him by the pledgee.

(September 3, 1891.)

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Field, Ch. J.) for the opinion of the full court of a suit brought to redeem certain securities which had been pledged by complainant's insolvent assignor to defendant as collateral for certain of his obligations. Bill dismissed.

Complainant's assignor executed and delivered to defendant a note, of which the following is a copy:

25000 Dolls. Boston, Mass. Dec. 14, 1888.

On demand, after date, with interest at per cent, I promise to pay to the Blackstone National Bank of Boston, or order, at said Bank, Twentyfive Thousand ¹⁰⁰ Dollars, for value received, having deposited with this obligation as Collateral Security,

149 Shares Smith & Dove Man'g Co.,

200 " Pacific Guano Co., with authority to sell the same, or any collaterals substituted for or added to the above, without notice, either at public or private sale, or otherwise, at the option of the said Blackstone National Bank, on the non-performance of this promise, said bank applying the net proceeds to the payment of this note, and accounting to me for the surplus, if any; and it is hereby agreed that such surplus, or any excess of collaterals upon this note, shall be applicable to any other note or claim against me held by said bank. Should the market value of any security pledged for this loan, in the judgment of the holder or holders hereof, decline, I hereby agree to deposit on demand (which may be made by a notice in writing, sent by mail or otherwise to my residence or place of business) additional collateral, so that the market value shall always be satisfactory to said bank, and failing to deposit such additional security, this note shall be deemed to be due and payable forthwith, anything hereinbefore expressed to the contrary notwithstanding, and the holder or holders may immediately reimburse themselves by the sale of the security; and it is hereby agreed that the holder or holders of this note, or any person in his or their behalf, may purchase at any such sale.

Joseph W. Smith.

Jan. 3, 1889—Received five thousand dollars.

Jan. 5, 1889—Received five thousand dollars.

The further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. J. B. Warner, for plaintiff:

There was no such "non-performance" by Smith as entitled the Bank to cut off by a sale his right to redeem his stock.

The security is primarily pledged for his note alone, and if this note was not dishonored the defendant acquired no further claim to the stock.

Hathaway v. Fall River Nat. Bank, 181 Mass. 14.

18 L. R. A.

The conduct of the Bank in assuring Smith that the demand was not then insisted on, and the resulting understanding, upon which Smith must be presumed to have relied, supply all the elements of estoppel.

Blake v. Exchange Mut. Ins. Co. of Phila. 12 Gray. 285; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Norton, 96 U. S. 284, 24 L. ed. 689; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Eggleston, 96 U. S. 572, 24 L. ed. 841.

But even if the note was so dishonored, when the plaintiff offered to pay it, that the Bank already had a right to sell the stock, still the right of redemption was not cut off so long as the Bank held the stock.

The terms of the note do not make the stock security for other debts simply upon non-payment of the note. Upon non-payment the stock may be sold, but it is not until it has been sold, the note paid, and a surplus obtained, that the right of the Bank to apply that surplus takes effect.

Hathaway v. Fall River Nat. Bank, supra.

The plaintiff's offer to pay the note, being accompanied with present ability and actual intention to pay, has, at least in equity, all the effect which a tender upon the same condition could have.

Cumnock v. Newburyport Sav. Inst. 2 New Eng. Rep. 588, 142 Mass. 342, 347.

The duties of pledgor and pledgee are reciprocal, and the right to a return of the security is indissolubly bound with the obligation to pay.

Whether or not this right is correctly treated as making a strict legal condition, as in many cases (Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. 200; Halpin v. Phenix Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 165; Cass v. Higgenbottom, 1 Cent. Rep. 315, 100 N. Y. 248; Ocean Nat. Bank v. Fant, 50 N. Y. 474; Stuart v. Bigler, 98 Pa. 80), it would probably be recognized in some way, even at law, so far as to prevent an enforcement of the debt if the creditor had destroyed the security or expressly refused to restore it.

In equity the creditor's obligation to return the security is concurrent with that of the debtor to pay his debt, and the debt cannot be enforced unless at the same time the security is restored.

Palmer v. Hendrie, 27 Beav. 349; Kinnaird v. Trollope, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 636.

The mere fact that a return of the security is refused seems, in this court, to be sufficient ground for proceedings in equity to obtain it on payment of the debt.

Bartlett v. Johnson, 9 Allen, 580; Fowle v. Ward, 113 Mass. 548; Hathaway v. Fall River Nat. Bank, supra. See Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 504; Kemp v. Westbrook, 1 Ves. Sr. 278.

In the sense that a debt owed by my firm can be enforced against all the members, including me, the firm debt is my debt; but the expression "claims against me" naturally points to individual, not joint, claims, and it is a matter for consideration which is meant.

Emerson v. Knower, 8 Pick. 63.

The property was Smith's individually, and he would not naturally devote it to paying firm debts. Considering the usual mercantile view of a firm, which the law recognizes as different from the legal view (Corey, Accounts, chap. 4), Smith would hardly have intended anything but his own debts when he used the word "me."

The personal and the partnership relations are not to be confused, and should be recognized as distinct unless there is a clear intention to treat them on the same footing.

Re Tuff, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 88; Westenholt v. Sheffield Union Bkg. Co. 54 L. T. N. S. 746.

The form of the note was a printed blank furnished by the Bank, and was such as would, presumably, have been used if Smith had not been a member of any firm. It is a mere accident that the language can cover a state of facts which neither party had in mind, and it would strain too far the effect of a printed form to make it cover more than was obvious at the time.

Where a firm obligation is several as well as joint, a bank can apply the individual deposit of a partner to the payment of a debt of the firm.

Eyrich v. Capital State Bank, 67 Miss. 60, 18 L. R. A.

Where a statute has made a partnership debt joint and several so that its creditors can sue a single partner therefor, a defendant can set off his claim against the firm in an action by such single partner against him on an individual debt.

Allen v. Maddox, 40 Iowa, 124. See Leach v. Lambeth, 14 Ark. 668.

The clause in the note "that such surplus or any excess of collaterals upon this note shall be applicable to any other notes or claim against me held by said Bank" relates to such notes or claims as might be held by the creditor at the time recourse was had to the collateral.

San Antonio Nat. Bank v. Blocker, 77 Tex. 73, 78.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill to redeem certain stock given by one Smith, the plaintiff's insolvent, to the defendant as collateral security for a loan to Smith. The main question is whether the defendant can hold the stock as security not only for the loan mentioned, but also for two acceptances of a firm of which Smith was a member, which acceptances the defendant had discounted before the date of the loan in question. The note given by Smith for the loan authorizes the defendant to sell the stock "on the non-performance of this promise, said Bank applying the net proceeds to the payment of this note and accounting to me for the surplus, if any." It then goes on, and these are the important words, "and it is hereby agreed that such surplus, or any excess of collaterals upon this note, shall be applicable to any other note or claim against me held by said Bank."

The counsel for the plaintiff based his argument on the proposition that the right to apply the excess of collaterals to any other note or claim was conditional upon Smith's non-performance of his promise. We think it doubtful, at least, whether that is the true construction of the words which we have quoted. We are disposed to read the agreement as an absolute pledge or mortgage of the securities for other notes and claims. But if this be not so we are of opinion that Smith did not perform his promise within the meaning of the note. The Bank demanded payment of Smith on January 8, 1889, and he made partial payments, but failed to pay the residue and requested the Bank to make the balance a time loan, which the Bank refused. This was a non-performance of his promise by Smith. It is true that the report states that it was understood that the demand should not be pressed without further notice. But this did not take away the effect of the breach. It merely called on the Bank to give notice before taking further steps, such as selling the security, and this it did. We neither construe the report as meaning, nor do we infer from it, that the breach of Smith's promise by his failure to pay on demand was waived by the Bank. On January 8, if not before, the Bank's right vested to apply any excess of collaterals upon other claims.

The question remains whether the Bank is entitled to hold the security for the bills, which were accepted by Smith's firm and not by him individually. It cannot be denied that the acceptances were "claims against him" and that the words used in his note were broad enough to embrace firm acceptances unless there is some reason in the contract, the circumstances, or mercantile practice, to give them a narrower meaning. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Allen, 122 Mass. 467; Chuck v. Freen, Mood. & M. 259.

If Smith had had private dealings and a private account with the Bank as a depositor, and his firm also had had dealings and an account there, and Smith had given security in the terms of his note, in order to be allowed to overdraw or to obtain a discount, it may be that the generality of the language would be restrained to the line of dealings in the course of which it is used. Ex parte McKenna (City Bank Case), 3 DeG. F. & J. 629. See Lindley, Partn. 5th ed. 119, note.

But we are called on to construe a printed form used by the Bank and presented by it for those who borrow from it to sign. The question is, What is the reasonable interpretation of such words when insisted on as a general formula to be used by would-be borrowers, irrespective of any special course of business of the particular person who signs it, which, for the matter of that, there does not appear to have been in this case. For all that appears, the note mentioned may have been the only transaction that ever took place between the defendant and the plaintiff alone. The printed form, it may be assumed, would have been used by the Bank equally in a case where the borrower was the principal man in his firm and the only one known to the Bank, was borrowing for his firm daily, and had never borrowed for himself but in this instance, and in a case where the borrower's membership in a firm whose notes the Bank held was unknown. This being so in the opinion of a majority of the court, there is no sufficient reason for not giving the words their full legal effect. The clause pledging the property for any other claim against the debtor is not inserted with a view to certain specific debts, but as a drag-net to make sure that whatever comes to the creditor's hands shall be held by the latter until its claims are satisfied. Corey on Accounts and Lindley on Partnership have made it popular to refer to a mercantile distinction between the firm and its members. But we have no doubt that our merchants are perfectly aware that claims against their firms are claims against them, and when a merchant gives security for any claim against him, and there is nothing to cut down the literal meaning of the words, he must be taken to include claims against him as partner.

Decree accordingly. Bill dismissed.

BOSTON & PROVIDENCE R. CO.

(.....Mass.....)

A grandchild of one granting land to a railroad company, who has ceased to be a member of the latter's household, has no rights under a clause in the deed entitling the grantor and his family to free passage over the road as long as the granted land shall continue to be used for railroad purposes under the charter of the grantees.

(September 2, 1891.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County dismissing her bill filed to enforce performance of a condition in a deed by John C. Dodge, deceased, granting land to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Miss Caroline E. Dodge, appellant, in propria persona:

The usage of the word "family" among other things, includes "descendants."

See Crundon's Concordance; Spencer v. Spencer, 11 Paige, 160, 5 L. ed. 92; Redf. Wills, pt. 2, p. 395; Williams v. Williams, 1 Sim. N. S. 357, 371; Webster, Dict. title, Family.

Mr. J. H. Benton, Jr., for defendant:

The primary meaning of the word "family" is "the collective body of persons who live in one house and under one head or management."

Webster, Dict.; Worcester, Dict.; Psalms lxxviii. 6.

The secondary meaning is "those who descend from one common progenitor; a tribe or race, kindred, as the human family, the family of Abraham."

Webster, Dict.; Worcester, Dict.; Judges xiii. 2.

It is to be presumed that this word was used in its primary, usual and ordinary sense, and not in its secondary sense.

If the agreement in the deed bears the construction put upon it by the plaintiff, it was against public policy, and void. A railroad corporation cannot bind itself to carry in perpetuity the descendants of any person free of charge. Such a corporation is only a trustee of the public highway, and an agreement of that kind would be a direct violation of its duty as such trustee.

Worcester v. Western R. Corp. 4 Met. 564, 566.

But assuming that the contract to carry the descendants of the grantor is upon adequate consideration and not against public policy, it was not with the plaintiff, and cannot be enforced by her.

Re Empress Engineering Co. L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 125.

This contract, if it bears the construction put upon it by the plaintiff, cannot be enforced in equity. Upon such construction it is a contract to carry an indefinite number of persons in perpetuity, and any decree for its performance would necessarily be as indefinite in its terms as the contract itself.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity, filed on February 23, 1888, for specific performance of an agreement alleged to have been made by the defendant, in 1836, with John C. Dodge, the plaintiff's grandfather. The case was heard before a single justice of this court upon the pleadings and evidence, and comes before us on the plaintiff's appeal from a decree dismissing the bill.

From the evidence it appears that the defendant corporation, on December 23, 1833, took by the right of eminent domain a parcel of land belonging to John C. Dodge in the Town of Attleborough, and, having constructed its road over the land so taken, began to run trains of cars from Boston to Providence on August 23, 1835. By deed dated September 1, 1836, and acknowledged on May 6, 1837, John C. Dodge conveyed a right of way over the land so taken to the defendant. After the description of the premises conveyed, and before the habendum, were the following clauses: "It being understood and agreed by and between the said parties to this deed that the said corporation shall erect, make, and keep up all necessary fences between the lands of the grantor and the land taken for said railroad. And it is further agreed by and between the said parties to this deed, and the said corporation by the acceptance of this deed do covenant and agree to and with the said grantor, for themselves, their successors and assigns, that the said grantor and his family shall have and enjoy the right of free passage on and over said railroad in the cars of said corporation, their successors and assigns as long as the land and appurtenances hereinbefore described shall continue to be used as a railroad, or for railroad purposes under the charter of said corporation."

It further appears from the evidence that in 1836 John C. Dodge had nine sons living with him; that in 1854 or 1855, he left this Commonwealth and did not return to it; and died in January, 1866; that the plaintiff's

In all cases where a consideration is required, a party suing on a contract must show that the consideration flowed from him (Boulton v. Jones, 2 Hurlst. & N. 564; Mitchell v. Lapage, Holt, N. P. 253; Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28; as privity or reciprocal recognition is essential to establish a contractual relation. Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Q. B. 359; Leake, Cont. 2d ed. 612; 1 Wharton, Cont. § 508.

The consideration may be some benefit to the defendant, but it must be some detriment to the plaintiff, and it must move from the plaintiff. 1 Wharton, Cont. § 506.

The promise so far as the promisee is concerned must not have been gratuitous. He must have done something or suffered something at the promisor's request, as a reason for the promise, as no one can sue on a contract to which he was not a party. See Anderson v. Longden, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 85, 5 L. ed. 42; Shear v. Mallory, 13 Johns. 497; Tweddle v. Atkinson, 1 Best & S. 393; Price v. Easton, 1 Barn. & Ad. 433.

Thus, a bill for a specific performance can only be brought by those who are parties to the contract. Tasker v. Small, 8 Myl. & C. 69; Wood v. White, 4 Myl. & C. 460; Paterson v. Long, 5 Beav. 186; French Civil Code, art. 1165; 1 Wharton, Cont. § 734.

Rules for construction.

All the terms of a deed should be construed together. Lowdermilk v. Bostick, 98 N. C. 299; Jones v. Pashby, 5 West. Rep. 571, 62 Mich. 614; Grueber v. Lindenmeier, 42 Minn. 99.

The construction must be upon the entire deed, and not on disjointed parts. Grueber v. Lindenmeier and Jones v. Pashby, supra; Baldwin v. Marton, And. 225.

Every word and clause should be given some force and meaning, so far as possible. Robinson v. Missisquoi R. Co. 4 New Eng. Rep. 391, 59 Vt. 426. See Coleman v. Sherwin, Carth. 98; Shrewsbury's Case, 9 Coke, 47.

Courts should ascertain and give effect to the real intention of the parties; and such intention must 13 L. R. A.

be gathered from the whole instrument. Richter v. Richter, 10 West. Rep. 250, 111 Ind. 456; Lehndorf v. Cope, 11 West. Rep. 620, 122 Ill. 317; Co. Litt. 814b.

Where that intention is clearly revealed, it furnishes the rule by which deeds as well as statutes and other contracts must be construed. Case v. Dexter, 9 Cent. Rep. 259, 106 N. Y. 553.

Such a construction ought to be made of deeds, that their end and design should take effect; and such construction should be made of their words as is most agreeable to the intent of the grantor. These maxims are founded upon the highest authority.—Coke, Plowden, and Lord Chief Justice Hale; and the law commends the astuta, the cunning of judges, in construing words in such a manner as shall best answer the intent. Smith v. Packhurst, 3 Atk. 136.

For in expounding a grant according to the intent, it must be done according to the intent at the time of the grant (Alderman of Chesterfield's Case, Cro. Eliz. 35); in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Newaygo Mfg. Co. v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 7 West. Rep. 334, 64 Mich. 114; Zimmer v. Miller, 1 Cent. Rep. 702, 64 Md. 236.

The law in the true construction of grants hath respect to the estate of the grantor; to the ability of the grantee; to the consideration which leads the estate; and to the recompense, and loss which is sustained. Gough v. Howards, 3 Bulst. 125.

Words in grants should be construed according to a reasonable and easy sense, and not be strained to things unlikely and unusual. London v. The Chapter of Southwell, Hob. 304.

Technical rules of construction are not to be resorted to, when the meaning of the maker of a deed is obvious. Henderson v. Mack, 32 Ky. 379.

Such rules are not favored, and are not to be so applied as to defeat the intention of the parties, but effect must be given to such intention if practicable, when no principle of law will be thereby violated. Grueber v. Lindenmeier, 42 Minn. 99.

Judges in their judgments have great regard to the generality of the cases, and to the inconveniences which may ensue either way; talit interpretatio semper flenda est, ut evitetur absurdum, et inconvenientia, et ne iudicium sit illusorium. Case of Alton Woods, 1 Coke, 52.

father, a son of John C. Dodge, was living with him in 1836, and continued to live with him from that time until about a year after his own marriage in 1846; that he left the Commonwealth in 1850, and returned to it in 1885 or 1886, and now resides here.

In regard to the plaintiff, the testimony shows that she was born in 1854 or 1855, in the State of Pennsylvania; that when she was a child she lived for some time in the family of her grandfather after he left this Commonwealth; and that she returned here with her father in 1885 or 1886, and has since lived with him.

The evidence was somewhat conflicting on the question whether the defendant has by its acts recognized the plaintiff as a person entitled to ride free over its road. It does appear that when she was a child she occasionally went over the road, when accompanied by her father or mother, and was allowed to do so; and that, since she came of age, passes had been occasionally given to her, she claiming the right to have them, but, as she states in her brief, "usually on objection by the officer of the Company." On this state of the evidence we need not consider how far the defendant would be bound by what the plaintiff contends is the practical construction put upon the deed by the officers of the defendant corporation. We find nothing in the evidence to show conclusively that what was accorded to her after she came of age was other than as a favor.

We pass, therefore, to the consideration of the construction of the deed. The word "family" has several meanings. Its primary meaning is the collective body of persons who live in one house and under one head or management. Its secondary meaning is those who are of the same lineage, or descend from one common progenitor.

Unless the context manifests a different intention, the word "family" is usually construed in its primary sense. In Rer v. Darlington, 4 T. R. 797, under the Settlement Act of 8 and 9 Wm. III., chap. 30, which provided for the granting of a certificate to a poor person who wished to remove from his own parish to another; and that the latter parish should "be obliged to receive and provide for the person mentioned in the certificate, together with his or her family,"—it was held that the certificate did not extend to a grandchild of the person receiving it, who lived with his father, but not with his grandfather.

Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., said: "In common 13 L. R. A.

parlance, the family consists of those who live under the same roof with the pater-familias; those who form (if I may use the expression) his fire-side. But when they branch out, and become the heads of new establishments, they cease to be part of the father's family." See also Oystend v. Shed, 18 Mass. 520; Bowditch v. Andrew, 8 Allen, 339; Poor v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 125 Mass. 274; Bates v. Dewson, 128 Mass. 334; Bradlee v. Andrews, 187 Mass. 50; Phelps v. Phelps, 143 Mass. 570, 4 New Eng. Rep. 183.

The plaintiff, however, contends that the words "so long as the land and appurtenances hereinbefore described shall continue to be used as a railroad or for railroad purposes under the charter of said corporation" imply perpetual succession, and must necessarily include all the descendants of John C. Dodge.

But we are of opinion that these words are words of limitation of the grant, and not words extending the meaning of the word "family."

By the charter of the defendant corporation, the Commonwealth reserved the right, at any time after twenty years from the opening for use of the road, to purchase of the corporation its railroad, and its franchise, property and privileges. Stat. 1831, chap. 56, § 12. The words "under the charter of the corporation" were therefore necessary to limit the agreement to carry to the time the corporation might have the power to use the land for railroad purposes.

So, too, the words, "used for railroad purposes," were a necessary and proper limitation of the contract to carry. If the location of the road were changed, and the land conveyed by Dodge should revert to him, the parties would naturally provide that the contract to carry should be at an end.

Other contingencies might also happen.

By the Statute of 1830, chap. 81, passed on March 11, 1831, the charter of the defendant corporation could be repealed at the pleasure of the Legislature; its franchise might be forfeited for misuser or nonuser; or it might be surrendered.

All these considerations show that the words in question were words of limitation, and did not extend the word "family" so as to include the descendants of John C. Dodge to the remotest generation. We are of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff, after she ceased to be a member of her grandfather's household, was not entitled to a free pass over the road of the defendant as one of his family.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The business of slaughtering animals for food is not a nuisance, as a matter of law, independently of the manner in which it is conducted, if the slaughter-house is situated in a new and sparsely settled portion of a city, in the neighborhood of stockyards and other slaughter-houses.
2. The noise made by hogs kept in confinement for the purpose of slaughter is not such a nuisance as to justify the destruction of a slaughter-house business for the sole purpose of ridding a neighborhood of such noise.
3. That the existence of a slaughter-house depreciates the value of neighboring property is not sufficient ground to justify a decree interfering with the business carried on therein.
4. A decree which attempts to enjoin a nuisance caused by the manner of carrying on a business should specifically point out the things which are to be done and to be refrained from in order to abate the nuisance.

5. A slaughter-house business will be destroyed by a court of chancery at the instance of persons who moved into its neighborhood after it was established, only when it is injurious to health, where it was located at the outskirts of a city in a locality where similar kinds of business had been already established.

(December 24, 1890.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree in chancery of the Circuit Court for Wayne County enjoining the carrying on of a slaughter-house business in such a way as to make it a nuisance. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Parker & Burton for complainants.

Messrs. Conely, Maybury & Lucking, for defendant:

That the slaughter-house diminishes the value of the neighboring lands, considered alone, can be no ground for an injunction.

Morris & E. R. Co. v. Prudden, 20 N. J. Eq. 537, 539; Zabriske v. Jersey City & B. R. Co.

NOTE.—When injunction will be denied to restrain an alleged nuisance.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain the erection of a slaughter-house and place for keeping hogs, where, by the answer and affidavits, it appears the defendants intend to carry on the business so as not to be a nuisance. If it should be carried on in such manner as that it becomes a nuisance, it will then be enjoined. Atty-Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415.

A trade or business will not be enjoined unless it appears, from the place or manner in which it is carried on, that it materially injures the property of others, or affects their health, or renders the enjoyment of life physically uncomfortable; in such case it is a nuisance, which it is the duty of the court to restrain. Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 294.

Occupying real property in cities as a hog-yard, and fat and offal-boiling house is prima facie a common nuisance; but this presumption may be rebutted by showing that the business is so conducted and carried on as not to endanger the health, or interfere with the comfort, of the neighboring inhabitants. Dubois v. Budlong, 15 Abb. Pr. 445.

Until the Legislature provide a remedy, or until the fact of a nuisance is established by proof, it would be wrong to restrain a lawful calling merely because it does or might offend the senses of some. Ibid.

In the case of Catlin v. Valentine, 9 Paige, 575, 4 L. ed. 821, the chancellor held that the occupation of a building in a city, as a slaughter-house, was prima facie a nuisance to the neighboring inhabitants, and might be restrained by injunction. And in that case he refused to dissolve the injunction, and retained it until the hearing; although the defendant, in his answer, denied that a slaughter-house was a nuisance. To constitute a nuisance, it is not necessary that the noxious trade or business should endanger the health of the neighborhood. It is sufficient if it produces that which is offensive to the senses, and which renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable. Rex v. White, 1 Burr. 337; 3 Bl. Com. 217; Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157.

But the discomfort must be physical, not such as depends on taste or imagination. But whatever is offensive, physically, to the senses, and by such offensiveness makes life uncomfortable, is a nuisance; and it is not the less so because there may be persons whose habits and occupations have brought them to endure the same annoyances without discomfort. For a strikingly similar definition, see Walter v. Selfe, 15 Jur. 418, 4 Eng. L. & Eq. 15; Westcott v. Middleton, 10 Cent. Rep. 202, 43 N. J. Eq. 478.

Slaughter-houses not necessarily a nuisance.

Slaughter-houses in a city or town were once reckoned by the courts as nuisances per se, and they are still so classed in the opinion of the court in Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 540, 28 Am. Rep. 378, decided as late as 1877; but it is said in a late work of merit that the wonderful improvements wrought by science in all departments of life has shown that this position cannot now be upheld in reference to any trade, and that slaughter-houses are now regarded merely as prima facie nuisances. Wood, Nuisances, §§ 503, 504, and cases there cited.

While it is true that persons living in a city must suffer the consequences which come from the bustle and noise incident to the activity of business and the manner in which it may be done, and from the various causes which are produced by a dense population against which there is no legal ground for complaint, they are entitled to protection against the carrying on of a trade or business in a manner which materially injures their property or affects their health, or renders the enjoyment of it physically uncomfortable. Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. Cas. 408; Catlin v. Valentine, 9 Paige, 575, 4 L. ed. 821; Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157.

No action will lie and no recovery can be had for doing that which the law authorizes the party to do, and that cannot be adjudged a nuisance and be held unlawful, which the law declares to be lawful. New York & E. R. Co. v. Young, 33 Pa. 175; Renwick v. Morris, 3 Hill, 621; Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Kirk, 46 Pa. 112; Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. 19 N. J. Eq. 814, 818; Atty-Gen. v. Nichol, 16 Ves. Jr. 342, 343; 2 Story Eq. Jur. § 925.

The remedy by injunction must be confined to that specific thing which constitutes the actual nuisance, as shown by the proofs.

Welch v. Stowel, 2 Dougl. 832; Wreford v. People, 14 Mich. 41, 46; Babcock v. New Jersey S. Y. Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 296.

Courts will rarely interfere by injunction, where it may be stopped by indictment.

Morris & E. R. Co. v. Prudden, supra.

If a business is lawful and is carried on in a suitable place, even though to the annoyance of neighbors, still courts will not enjoin.

Doelner v. Tynan, 38 How. Pr. 182-186, and many cases cited; Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 448-455.

The court will consider the loss, the locality, all the circumstances and surroundings, even after a verdict that the thing is a nuisance, before giving an injunction.

Wood, Nuisances, § 483, p. 530.

Nothing can be a nuisance which is permitted to be set up by competent authority.

The occupation of a building as a slaughter-house is to be regarded as prima facie a nuisance, and where such a building exists so near dwelling-houses as to impair their comfortable enjoyment, it is an actionable nuisance. Catlin v. Valentine, 9 Paige, 575, 4 L. ed. 821.

The business of slaughtering animals ought not to be carried on in the populous parts of a city, and, more especially, when connected with slaughtering is the act of burning bristles and boiling offal. Dubois v. Budlong, 15 Abb. Pr. 445; 10 Bosw. 700.

And where slaughter-houses are originally erected on vacant ground, remote from human habitations, or public places, if they become nuisances by reason of roads being afterwards laid out in their vicinity, or by dwellings being subsequently erected near them, the fact of their prior existence in a place remote from dwellings is no defense. Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157; Com. v. Upton, 6 Gray, 473. And see Bankart v. Houghton, 27 Beav. 425; Howell v. McCoy, 3 Rawle, 256; 4 Watt, Act. & Def. 751.

Rule as to the measure of damages.

The rule of damage to real estate where the injury is to the value of the premises themselves, is the difference between the value of the premises before the injury and immediately after. 1 Hill, Torts, 608, § 18, a; Wood, Nuisances, § 853; *Seely v. Where the nuisance can be abated, this rule does not apply. In such case, the measure of damages is the loss in rental value by the continuance of the nuisance. *Chipman v. Cahill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants are the owners of, and occupy, as residence property, lands in the northern part of the City of Detroit, lying between Trumbull Avenue and Twelfth Street, and between Merrick Avenue and Kirby Street. The neighborhood is a new one, as a residence part of the city, the complainants having for the most part moved there within a year prior to the filing of their bill in 1887. In the spring of 1886, the defendant had erected a slaughter-house on the southeast corner of Twelfth and Kirby Streets, the cost of which was something over $4,000. Before doing so, he testified that he had acquired permission from the common council. In the near neighborhood was King's cattle-yard and Wreford's slaughter-house, both of which had been in operation some years. Defendant was engaged principally in slaughtering hogs. The hogs were received by rail, and were unloaded from a side track near the slaughter-house to the number of about 300 a week. They were usually kept in the yard at least over night, and sometimes twenty-four hours, to cool off before killing. Sometimes

A public nuisance is one which affects at the same time an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons, although the extent of the annoyance or damage inflicted upon individuals may be unequal. Cal. Civ. Code, § 3480. All others are private nuisances. Id. § 3481.

Any person may maintain an action for a private and particular injury, distinct from that of the public in general for the commission of a public nuisance. Pierce v. Dart, 7 Cow. 606; *Lansing v. The writ of injunction can rightfully be demanded to prevent irreparable injury, interminable litigation and a multiplicity of suits, and its refusal in a proper case would be error to be corrected by an appellate tribunal. It is matter of grace in no sense except that it rests in the sound discretion of the court, and that discretion is not an arbitrary one. If improperly exercised in any case, either in granting or refusing it, the error is one to be corrected upon appeal. Corning v. Troy Iron & N. Factory, 40 N. Y. 191; Reid v. Gifford, *Hopk. car-loads of hogs intended for King's stock-yards, as well as for the defendant's, would stand upon the track for several hours at a time, and would make considerable noise by squealing. Complainants allege in their bill that the swine confined in defendant's yards produce a large amount of manure and filth, and give off an offensive, sickening, and unwholesome stench, and that at times it becomes so unendurable that the inhabitants, of whom complainants form a part, are compelled to leave their homes; that the confined swine make a great disturbance and noise by squealing so loudly as to awaken persons from sleep, and so constantly as to disturb inhabitants at all times, both day and night. It is alleged that, in consequence of the business carried on by defendant, the land in the vicinity has become depreciated in value, and complainants charge that the stench arising from said swine, and from the drying hair taken from the slaughtered hogs, and from the said slaughter-house, constitutes a nuisance, and that the noise and disturbance made by said swine in confinement constitute a nuisance; that such nuisances are greatly injurious to the health, comfort, and property interests of the complainants; that the injury to the complainants' health and comfort cannot be measured by monetary value; that the injury to their property interests is upwards of $5,000; and that for such injury to their health, comfort, and property, they are without any adequate relief except in equity. The prayer of the bill is for preliminary and perpetual injunction to restrain defendant from further using or employing his property for a slaughter-house wherein to slaughter swine or any other animals, and from employing the same for the purposes of confining therein quantities of swine or other animals for the purpose of slaughtering them, and for using the same or any part of it as a drying-yard for drying hair or bristles taken from the slaughtered swine; also for general relief.

Defendant answered admitting that he owned and operated the slaughter-house at the place stated in the bill, and for purposes substantially as charged, but denied that the place was uncleanly, or gave out noisome or unwholesome smells, or that the same was a nuisance in any way. Says that the slaughter-house had been erected, and was carried on, after the newest and most approved methods, and was kept as clean as is possible for such a place to be kept; that it had been constructed expressly for the purpose for which he was using it, and that if he should be prevented from making such use of it the value of the property, amounting to about $5,000, would be almost wholly destroyed; that when defendant bought and built there, there were very few buildings in the neighbourhood; and that, as yet, the neighbourhood was sparsely settled. The case was heard before Hon. George S. Hosmer, circuit judge, a large number of witnesses being examined on each side, and the testimony being very conflicting. Upon the part of the complainants, the testimony tended to show that the people living in the vicinity of the defendant's slaughter-house were annoyed, especially during the summer months, by offensive smells coming from the direction of the defendant's place; that these smells were in some instances so offensive as to make the parties sick. It also appeared that people were kept awake at night by the squealing of hogs confined in defendant's yard. It does not clearly appear from the complainants' proof, however, whether the offensive smells of which they complain were such as were necessarily connected with a slaughter-house for the slaughtering of hogs maintained in a proper manner, or whether such smells were due to the improper conduct of the business, and in consequence of defendant's neglect to keep the place in as clean a condition as the same could be kept with proper care. There was evidence tending to show that defendant was in the habit of spreading the hair scraped from the slaughtered hogs upon the ground to dry before sending the same to market, and some of the witnesses thought that much of the unwholesome smell came from this hair. On the part of the defendant, the testimony tended to show that great care was used by defendant to keep the place clean and wholesome; that the manure and other offal was removed every day by wagons to a distance in the country; that much of the noise with which complainants found fault came from the squealing of hogs standing in cars on the track intended for King's stock-yards. A considerable number of witnesses called by the defense, who lived in the neighborhood where defendant's business was carried on, testified that they had never noticed any offensive smells, and were never disturbed by the squealing of hogs. The court below found as a fact that in the prosecution of the business conducted by the defendant he has, at various times, been guilty of maintaining a nuisance in the noxious and offensive odors from the confined swine, and from swine in the process of being slaughtered, and has also been guilty of maintaining a nuisance in the offensive odors from the drying hair and bristles taken from the slaughtered swine, and that at times, depending on the state of the weather or the direction of the wind, such nuisances have been unbearable. The decree, however, did not order the defendant to cease using the place as a slaughter-house altogether, but decreed that defendant refrain from using or employing the buildings and sheds erected on defendant's premises for the purpose of a slaughter-house wherein to slaughter hogs in such a way as to be offensive to, or become a nuisance to, the complainants; and that defendant desist and refrain from using or employing the said inclosure or buildings for the purpose of confining therein quantities of swine or other animals in such a way as to be offensive to, or to be a nuisance to, the complainants, or any of them; and that defendant desist and refrain from using said inclosure, or any part thereof, as a drying-yard in which to dry hair or bristles taken from the slaughtered swine. And the complainants were given leave to apply to the court for a further order enjoining or restraining defendant from using his premises in any wise for the purpose of slaughtering or confining swine, if it shall appear that the further use of said buildings and inclosure by said defendant be offensive or noxious to the complainants, or any of them, because of the noises arising from the swine, or because of disagreeable odors arising from the inclosure caused by confining swine therein. From this decree, complainants and defendant have both appealed.

On the part of the complainants, it is insisted that the decree falls short of giving them the relief to which they are entitled, because, having adjudged the defendant's business to be a nuisance, such judgment was not followed by an injunction perpetually restraining defendant from further carrying on such business. On the part of the defendant, it is claimed that the complainants were not entitled to any relief under their bill and the proofs made, for the reasons: First. That it does not appear from the bill that the defendant is maintaining such a business as is a nuisance per se; that it does not appear from the bill but that the offensive odors arise from causes which can be remedied without any serious interference with the conduct of defendant's business; that there is no allegation in the bill, and substantially no proof, that defendant's slaughter-house is of itself a nuisance. Second. It is claimed that the decree gave no relief to complainants, and that, upon facts found by the circuit judge, the bill ought to have been dismissed. Without attempting to review the voluminous testimony in this record, we have arrived at the following conclusions:

1. That defendant's business is not of such a character as, when properly conducted, to constitute a nuisance in the neighborhood where it is situated. This is practically conceded by complainants; and, if it were not, we should not be willing to hold, as a matter of law, that a business so necessary and important as that in which defendant is engaged, and which his own profit and the convenience of the city requires should be conducted within reasonable distance of the market which he supplies, was of necessity a nuisance, independent of the manner in which it was conducted.

2. The noise made by hogs kept in confinement for the purpose of slaughter, being to some extent unavoidable, does not constitute such a nuisance as would justify a court of equity in destroying defendant's business for the sole purpose of ridding a neighborhood of such noise. We do not intend by this to intimate that we regard the squealing of pigs as a soothing sound. We have no doubt that such noises are more or less annoying to some people, depending somewhat upon their peculiar temperament. Some of complainants' witnesses testified that they did not notice the squealing of the pigs, which annoyed other members of the family; but in this age of steam and iron, the squealing of a pig is scarcely to be heard amid the multitude of greater noises that everywhere assault the ear. Within a short distance of defendant's place, and nearer to some of complainants than the slaughter-house, are the railroad tracks, over which run the engines with their shrieking whistles, louder than the squealing of a thousand hogs, in chorus, and their automatic bells, ringing at all times of the day and night, and yet none of the complainants would think of removing the railroad from their neighborhood because of the distressing noises which arise therefrom.

3. Complainants are not entitled to a decree which would interfere with defendant's business on the ground that the existence of it in that neighborhood depreciates the value of their property. As to such injury, if any, complainants have an adequate remedy at law. Wood, Nuis. 946; Atty-Gen. v. Nichol, 16 Ves. Jr. 342; Zabriskie v. Jersey City & B. R. Co. 13 N. J. Eq. 314; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 925.

4. We are satisfied that defendant has not, at all times, conducted his business with as much care to cleanliness as he ought. His counsel urged that the testimony fails to locate any offense arising from the slaughter-house proper. If this be granted, we fail to see the force of it. Complainants are not required to nicely discriminate as to the origin of offensive smells. The evidence is convincing that they come from defendant's place of business, and his business must be regarded as including all that is incident to it. The defendant insists that this business can be carried on so as not to be injurious to the health, or seriously offensive to complainants. The decree of the circuit court recognized this possibility, and undertook to give defendant time and opportunity to abate the nuisance complained of without requiring him to stop his business altogether. The trouble with the decree is that it fails to point out specifically what defendant is required to do in order to comply with its requirements. To adjudge that defendant should so conduct his business as not to be offensive is to give him no rule of conduct which the law had not before prescribed. The decree should have specifically pointed out the things that defendant was required to do, and to refrain from doing, in order to abate the nuisance which the court found to exist.

5. Defendant's business, established under the circumstances of this case, and conducted by him on his own premises, will not be enjoined because it cannot be carried on without some degree of offense and annoyance to those living near it. It is only when it reaches the point of discomfort where it becomes injurious to health that the injury can be said to be irreparable so as to call forth the extraordinary power of a court of chancery to destroy it. So careful is the law of human life and health that no consideration of mere property rights can be allowed to weigh against them. As to other wrongs, they can, for the most part, be compensated in damages. In the recent case of People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 9 L. R. A. 722, 82 Mich. 471, the rule in a case at law was stated by Mr. Justice Grant as follows: "The defendants cannot be protected in the enjoyment of their property, and the carrying on of their business, if it becomes a nuisance to people living upon the adjoining properties, and to those doing legitimate business with them. Whenever such a business becomes a nuisance, it must give way to the rights of the public, and either devise some means to avoid the nuisance or must remove or cease its business. It may not be continued to the injury of the health of those living in its vicinity. This rule is founded both upon reason and authority. Nor is it of any consequence that the business is a useful one, or necessary, or that it contributes to the wealth and prosperity of the community. Wood, Nuisances, § 19; Reg. v. Train, 2 Best & S. 640; Works v. Junction Railroad, 5 McLean, 425; Respublica v. Caldwell, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 150, 1 L. ed. 77; Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 296; Robinson v. Baugh, 31 Mich. 290. It is true that, in places of population and business, not everything that causes discomfort, inconvenience, and annoyance, or which perhaps may lessen the value of surrounding property, will be condemned and abated as a nuisance. It is often difficult to determine the boundary line in many such cases. The carrying on of many legitimate businesses is often productive of more or less annoyance, discomfort, and inconvenience, and may injure surrounding property for certain purposes, and still constitute no invasion of the rights of the people living in the vicinity. Such a case was Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 448.

In Cleveland v. Citizens Gas Light Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 205, the rule was stated more broadly: "Any business, however lawful, which causes annoyances, which materially interfere with ordinary comfort physically of human existence, is a nuisance that should be restrained; and smoke, noise, and bad odors, even when not injurious to health, may render a dwelling so uncomfortable as to drive from it anyone not compelled by poverty to remain. Unpleasant odors, from the very constitution of our nature, render us uncomfortable, and when continued or repeated make life uncomfortable. . . . The only question is, What amounts to that discomfort from which the law will protect? The discomforts must be physical, not such as depend upon taste or imagination." This language was used in a case where the court was asked to restrain the defendants from erecting or carrying on their gas-works at the place at which they had begun to erect them or in the neighborhood of that place, and although the court declined to grant the injunction on the ground that it did not clearly appear that the works, "when completed, would be a nuisance," the foregoing rule was clearly stated as one that would govern the court in dealing with the company should complaint afterwards be made. The facts in that case were that defendants proposed to erect their gas-works in a populous residence portion of the City of Newark, and such a case is to be distinguished from this, where defendant erected his place of business at the outskirts of the city, and in a locality where similar kinds of business were already established. Most of the complainants had moved into this neighborhood since the defendant's business was established; and, although they have a right to be protected from nuisances that endanger the health of themselves or their families, a court of equity, in determining whether it will destroy defendant's business at their request, will consider whether the thing complained of is noxious or only disagreeable, and in the same connection will consider the fact that complainants have voluntarily put themselves into the disagreeable neighborhood. The rule here contended for is recognized by our Statute concerning the abatement of nuisances. How. Stat. § 1643. Under the general prayer for relief, complainants are entitled to a decree requiring defendant to remove from his premises every day all manure, blood, offal, hair, and other refuse of his establishment in covered garbage wagons, such as are in use by the board of public works in the City of Detroit, or in other wagons that will effectively avoid the spread of offensive odors; to thoroughly clean, cleanse, and disinfect his premises daily; to provide sufficient pens for the hogs in store so that they shall not be crowded and rendered noisy and quarrelsome by discomfort while in confinement; and to use such other precautions as are necessary to render his place of business clean and wholesome.

No costs will be awarded to either party in this court.

The decree below as to costs is affirmed.

Minnie SCHRECK et al.

(.....N. Y.....)

A tenancy by the entirety is severed by an absolute divorce between the tenants, and thereafter each holds his or her proportional share of the property as a tenant in common without survivorship.

(October 6, 1891.)

CROSS APPEALS by plaintiff and defendant Schreck from an order of the General make any disposition of the estate so as to affect the right of survivorship. In the case of Washburn v. Burns, 34 N. J. L. 18, the court, in speaking of the husband's rights in an estate by entirety, says: "The limit of this right of the husband is, that he

NOTE.—The rule as to estates by entirety, stated.

Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, overruling their motions for new trial of an action in which plaintiff was permitted to recover dower in an equal undivided half of certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Peckham, J.:

Cross-appeals by the plaintiff and the defendant, Schreck, from an order of the General Term, Supreme Court, First Department, which denied the motions of both plaintiff and the defendant, Schreck, for a new trial under section 1001 of the Code of Civil Procedure on their exceptions in the case.

The premises in question, situated on the south side of Fiftieth Street, in the City of New York, were conveyed by deed on April 28, 1886, to William Stelz and Minnie Stelz, his wife, and by force thereof the grantees became seised as tenants by the entirety. After this conveyance, William Stelz, on June 20, 1888, obtained a decree of divorce from his wife, Minnie Stelz, now Minnie Schreck, on the ground of her adultery. On October 18, 1888, William Stelz married the plaintiff, and on February 8, 1889, he died, leaving the plaintiff, his widow. His former wife, Minnie Schreck, survived him, and she, during the lifetime of Stelz, married Joseph Schreck. The plaintiff brought this action claiming dower in all the land and premises, and asking that such dower be admeasured, contending that by the judgment of divorce all estate and interest of the first wife ceased and was at an end.

The first wife, however, claimed the whole cannot do any act to the prejudice of the ulterior rights of the wife." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 622; Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 688.

Decree of divorce severs the estate.

It is the prevailing doctrine that a severance of the marital relation by divorce also severs the estate, and after divorce they no longer hold by entirety, but as joint tenants, or tenants in common, owing to the differing policies and laws of the States. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 6th ed. § 716; Harter v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197.

The integrity of the estate is dependent upon the united effect by the marital relation. Obviously, whenever this relation is terminated or destroyed, the estate which is but a parasite of the relation of matrimony, dies with it. "One legal person has been resolved by judgment of law into two distinct, individual persons, having in future no relations to each other; and with this change in their relations must necessarily follow a corresponding change of the tenancy dependent upon the previous relation. As they cannot longer hold in joint seisin, they must hold by moieties." See note to Den v. Hardenbergh, 18 Am. Dec. 371; 2 Bright, Husb. & W. 365.

A recent writer expresses the prevailing view in the following language: "There are differences of judicial opinion regarding this estate; as, for example, some deem husband and wife incapable of taking lands either jointly or in common, so that whatever the terms of a conveyance to them, they will hold by the entirety. Others permit them to take and hold as joint tenants or tenants in common if the deed is in express words that they shall. But all agree that this tenancy does not and cannot exist where there is no marriage. The consequence is that when the marriage ends by divorce it falls." Boyce v. Kepler, 118 Ind. 84, 36, 10 Am. St. Rep. 94, 96; Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1644.

Attitude of the courts as to estates of the entirety.

There is a very sturdy disposition upon the part of both the state and federal courts to resist any invasion of the ancient common-law doctrine of tenancy of the entirety. Whiton v. Snyder, 88 N. Y. 299; Baker v. Lamb, 11 Hun, 519; Wright v. Saddler, 20 N. Y. 320, 17 Alb. L. J. 393; Pollock v. Webster, 16 Hun, 104; Matteson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 62 Barb. 378; Wright v. Wright, 64 N. Phillips, 173 Mass. 178, 23 Am. Rep. 299; Gerard, Real Estate Titles, 2d ed. 72, 84; Wms. Real Estate, 5th ed. 225, note.

If an estate in fee be given to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants, nor tenants in common; for, being one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety,—the consequence of which is, that neither can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor. 2 Bl. Com. 182; Anderson, Law Dict. title, Entirety.

Under well-recognized rules of the common law parties occupying the relation of husband and wife were considered one person, and when land was conveyed to them as such, they held, not as joint tenants, but each being seised of the whole per tout et non per my, so that the survivor takes the whole, not by survivorship but by virtue of the original estate. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152.

A married woman and her husband constitute but one person in law; and where real property is conveyed or devised to them together they do not take by moieties. Both are seised of the entirety, and not as joint tenants or tenants in common; and the survivor takes the entire estate; and the deed of one without the other (if living) is inoperative and void. Jackson v. Stevens, Jackson v. McConnell, Barber v. Harris, Torrey v. Torrey, and Doe v. Howland, supra.

This is the law in the State of New York as to joint ownership of husband and wife under the legislation of 1848, 1849, and 1860. Goelet v. Gori, 81 Barb. 814; Torrey v. Torrey, supra; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Gregory, 49 Barb. 115; Freeman v. Barber, 8 Thomp. & C. 574; Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun, 519.

A dictum in Meeker v. Wright, 76 N. Y. 282, supported by a divided court, unsettled the law for some time in that jurisdiction as it was supposed to indicate an opinion of the court of appeals that, in such cases, husband and wife took as tenants in common; but the question was finally set at rest by the decision in Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, cited in the principal case, which held the law to be as stated in the context. This case overruled that of Feely v. Buckley, 28 Hun, 451. Gerard, Real Estate Titles, 3d ed. 67. See note to Baker v. Stewart (Kan.) 2 L. R. A. 434.

of the premises under the deed by right of survivorship notwithstanding the severance of the marital relations by the judgment of divorce. The court at the trial sustained the plaintiff's right to be endowed of an equal undivided half part of the land, on the ground that after judgment in the action for divorce the parties to such action became tenants in common.

Mr. George H. Kracht, for plaintiff:

The deed to William Stelz, and Minnie, his wife, created an estate by the entirety, and the consideration for the interest the said wife received in said estate from her said husband was her vow of fidelity, and she, as the wife of William Stelz, took the same upon condition implied in law that she would remain faithful to all the solemn obligations of the marriage relation; and upon breach of this implied condition, and a judgment dissolving the marriage in consequence of said breach, she forfeited her interest in said estate.

Absolute divorce from the bonds of matrimony has the same operation and effect as the death of the guilty party.

The rules laid down in Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 696; Lash v. Lash, 53 Ind. 528, and Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197, are wrong in principle, contrary to reason and natural justice, and against public policy. Barclay v. Waring, 58 Ga. 86.

The guilty wife should not be rewarded for bringing about an absolute divorce for her adultery by having half of her former husband's property bestowed upon her, to enjoy the same in common with her paramour, her subsequent husband.

The defendant, Minnie Schreck, is estopped by her own wrongful conduct from claiming title to the premises in question or any part thereof.

Mr. Edward W. Scudder Johnston, with Mr. Lewis S. Goebel, for defendant:

The deed to William Stelz and Minnie Stelz created a vested estate in the said Minnie Stelz to hold the whole of said estate jointly with the said William Stelz during the lives of both of them, and a vested right to take the whole of the said estate free from the interest of the other, upon surviving the said William Stelz, and these vested rights could not be divested by a subsequent decree of divorce whose effect was merely to sever the marital relation, and which, by its terms, went no further than that purpose.

A divorce is a creature of the statute and its effect must be determined by the provisions of the law under whose authority it is granted. All existing rights already vested remain and are not thereby ended or taken away except such as are expressly taken away or affected by statute. There is nothing in the statutes which deprives a woman of a vested right acquired by her during her coverture, even though her husband obtained a divorce from her for her adultery.

The seisin of the entirety by each and the right of survivorship cannot be divested by subsequent statute, as these rights are conveyed by virtue of the grant and not by mere acquisition, nor will the decree of divorce disturb vested rights or gifts.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We agree in this case with the views expressed by the learned judges who delivered the opinions at the special and general terms of the supreme court. The sole question arises out of the decree of divorce which the husband obtained from his first wife on account of her adultery.

Did that divorce have any, and if so what, effect upon the character of the holding of the real property by the former husband and wife? By the conveyance the husband and wife took an estate as tenants by the entirety. Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152; Zornstein v. Bram, 100 N. Y. 13, 1 Cent. Rep. 66.

Such a tenancy differs from all others. In one respect it is like a joint tenancy, in that there is a right of survivorship attached to both, but it is not a joint tenancy in substance or form. Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 615; Jackson v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 175; Bertles v. Nunan, supra.

It originated in the marital relation, and although the survivorship presents the greatest formal resemblance to joint tenancy, instead of founding the estate by the entirety upon the notion of joint tenancy, all the authorities refer it to the established effect of a conveyance to husband and wife pretty much independent of any principles which govern other cases. Jackson v. McConnell, supra.

At common law, husband and wife were regarded as one person, and a conveyance to them by name was a conveyance in law to but one person. These two real individuals, by reason of this relationship, took the whole of the estate between them, and each was seised of the whole and not of any undivided portion. They were thus seised of the whole, because they were legally but one person. Death separated them, and the survivor still held the whole, because he or she had always been seised of the whole, and the person who died had no estate which was descendible or devisable. Being founded upon the marital relation and upon the legal theory of the absolute oneness of husband and wife, when that unity is broken, not by death, but by a divorce a vinculo, it stands to reason that such termination of the marriage tie must have some effect upon an estate which requires the marriage relation to support its creation. The claim on the part of the counsel for the wife is that it is only necessary the parties should stand in the relation of husband and wife at the time of the conveyance, and at that time the estate vests, and no subsequent divorce can affect an estate which is already vested. But the very question is, What is the character of the estate which became vested by the conveyance? If it were of such kind that nothing but the termination of the marriage by the death of one of the parties could affect the estate conveyed, then, of course, the claim of the counsel is made out; but it is an assumption of the whole case to say that the estate vested was of the character he claims. When the idea upon which the creation of an estate by the entirety depends is considered, it seems to me much the more logical as well as plausible view to say that, as the estate is built upon the unity of husband and wife, it never would exist in the first place but for such unity, anything that terminates the legal fiction of the unity of two separate persons ought to have an effect upon the estate whose creation depended upon such unity. It would seem as if the continued existence of the estate would naturally depend upon the continued legal unity of the two persons to whom the conveyance was actually made. The survivor takes the whole in case of death, because that event has terminated the marriage and the consequent unity of person. An absolute divorce terminates the marriage and unity of person just as completely as does death itself, only instead of one, as in case of death, there are, in the case of divorce, two survivors of the marriage, and there are, from the time of such divorce, two living persons in whom the title still remains. It seems to me the logical and natural outcome from such a state of facts is that the tenancy by the entirety is severed, and a severance having taken place each takes his or her proportionate share of the property as a tenant in common, without survivorship. It is said that in such case it ought to be a joint tenancy, but I see no reason for that claim. As it has been held that seisin by the entirety does not create a joint tenancy either in substance or form (19 Wend. supra), and as a tenancy by the entirety depended wholly upon the marital relationship, there can be no reason why the seisin should be turned into a joint tenancy by virtue of the very fact which terminated the unity of person upon which the right of survivorship is itself founded, and to which it owed its continued existence.

It is true that a conveyance of this kind, if made to two persons who were not husband and wife, would at common law have created a joint tenancy. But our Statute provides that every estate granted or devised to two or more persons in their own right shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared to be a joint tenancy (1 Rev. Stat. 727, § 44). This Statute did not reach an estate by the entirety, nor did the Statutes of 1848 and 1849 and 1860 and 1862 (Bertles v. Nunan, supra). It, therefore, still exists under our law.

We have seen, however, that a tenancy by the entirety is not a joint tenancy in form or substance. Upon what principle should the termination of the former species of tenancy, resulting from an absolute divorce, be changed into the latter in the face of our Statute relating to joint tenancies? The conveyance did not expressly declare that the tenancy was to be a joint tenancy, and therefore when the original character of the tenancy by the entirety is changed, it cannot be transformed into that of a joint tenancy without a clear violation of our Statute.

The counsel for the defendant urges that we are giving, by this decision, a retroactive effect to a decree of divorce in a case not warranted by the Statute and in violation of the well-settled rule in this State as to the effect of such a decree. He says that we change the effect of the deed of conveyance, and that the decree of divorce not only severs the unity of person from the time of its entry, but that we allow it to date back to the date of the conveyance, and to give an effect to such conveyance that it did not have at the time of its execution. We think not.

We do not at all question the contention of the defendant's counsel that a decree of divorce in this State only operates for the future and has no retroactive effect or any other effect than that given by statute. But we hold that the character of the estate conveyed was such in its creation that it depended for its own continuance upon the continuance of the marital relation, and when that relation is severed, as well by absolute divorce as by death, the condition necessary to support the continuance of the original estate has ceased, and the character of the estate has for that reason changed. The estate does not revest in the grantor or his heirs, for no such condition can be found in the law or in the nature of the estate, and it must therefore remain in the grantees, but by an altered tenure. Their holding is now a holding of two separate persons, and for the reasons already given such holding should be by tenancy in common, and, of course, without any survivorship.

I think the contention that the first wife is entitled to the whole of the estate as survivor of her husband cannot be maintained. Although the question is new in this State, it has been somewhat debated in the courts of some of the other States. In Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197, and Lash v. Lash, 58 Ind. 526, and Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, similar views to those we have herein stated are set forth. A contrary decision has been made in Michigan, in the case of Lewis App., reported in 85 Mich. 340. We have read the opinion in that case, but we feel that our own view is more in accord with legal principles, and we cannot, therefore, follow it.

Upon the defendant's appeal the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Upon the appeal of the plaintiff, her counsel contends that there is a condition annexed to the estate by the entirety which is implied by law, and the condition is that each of the grantees shall remain faithful to the obligations of the married state, and shall not, by his or her misconduct, cause a dissolution of the marriage relation upon which the estate depends. I find no warrant for implying any such condition in the character of the holding, and still less for the result which, as he claims, flows from a violation of such condition. Its violation (judicially determined) results, according to the plaintiff's argument, in the immediate vesting of the whole estate in the innocent party to the marriage, just the same as if the other party thereto were actually dead instead of divorced. None of the authorities treat the estate as dependent upon any such condition, and, however proper it might be to enact by legislative authority a condition of that nature, this court has not that power.

It is unnecessary to add anything further to the views which have been expressed by the learned judges of the supreme court in this case, and we are of the opinion that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and as neither party appealing has succeeded here, the affirmance should be on both appeals, without costs.

The first count of the declaration was for an assault, and the second for negligence. The court ruled the plaintiff could not maintain her action on either count.

Messrs. E. N. Hill and Frederic Cunningham, for plaintiff:

It is no answer to a claim for an assault that the plaintiff submitted to it, if the circumstances are such that resistance would have seemed useless; consent obtained by a show of superior force, or under such circumstances that the will cannot be said to have acted freely, is not consent in contemplation of law.

Where is the sense of holding, in the case of a pilot, that the owners are liable for his negligence even when they have had no power of selection, being obliged by law to take the first one that offers?—and in the case of a surgeon that they are not liable for his negligence, though they have had the opportunity of selecting him, unless in such selection they have been wanting in due care?—especially when the pilot is employed only for a single service, and the surgeon is one of the regular crew of the ship.

The case of the pilot is not an exception. Liability for his negligence rests partly upon the ground that public policy makes the ship responsible for its safe navigation by public agencies as well as by servants of its own selection; partly upon the power of the master to displace and control the pilot; and partly upon the ground that it is a rule of the General Admiralty Law, and not of the common law.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents two questions: first, whether there was any evidence to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant by any of its servants or agents committed an assault on the plaintiff; secondly, whether there was evidence on which the jury could have found that the defendant was guilty of negligence towards the plaintiff. To sustain the first count, which was for an alleged assault, the plaintiff relied on the fact that the surgeon who was employed by the defendant vaccinated her on shipboard while she was on her passage from Queenstown to Boston. On this branch of the case the question is whether there was any evidence that the surgeon used force upon the plaintiff against her will. In determining whether the act was lawful or unlawful the surgeon's conduct must be considered in connection with the surrounding circumstances. If the plaintiff's behavior was such as to indicate consent on her part he was justified in his act, whatever her unexpressed feelings may have been. In determining whether she consented he could be guided only by her overt acts and the manifestations of her feelings. Ford v. Ford, 148 Mass. 578, 8 New Eng. Rep. 785; McCarthy v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 148 Mass. 550, 552, 2 L. R. A. 608.

It is undisputed that at Boston there are strict quarantine regulations in regard to the examination of emigrants to see that they are protected from small-pox by vaccination, and that only those persons who hold a certificate from the medical officer of the steamship stating that they are so protected, are permitted to land without detention in quarantine, or vaccination by the port physician. It appears that the defendant is accustomed to have its surgeons vaccinate all emigrants who desire it and who are not protected by previous vaccination, and give them a certificate, which is accepted at quarantine as evidence of their protection. Notices of the regulations at quarantine, and of the willingness of the ship's medical officer to vaccinate such as needed vaccination were posted about the ship in various languages, and on the day when the operation was performed the surgeon had a right to presume that she and the other women who were vaccinated understood the importance and purpose of vaccination for those who bore no marks to show that they were protected. By the plaintiff's testimony, which in this particular is undisputed, it appears that about two hundred women passengers were assembled below, and she understood from conversation with them that they were to be vaccinated; that she stood about fifteen feet from the surgeon and saw them form in a line and pass in turn before him; that he examined their arms and passing some of them by, proceeded to vaccinate those that had no mark; that she did not hear him say anything to any of them; that upon being passed by they each received a card and went on deck; that when her turn came she showed him her arm; he looked at it and said there was no mark and that she should be vaccinated; that she told him she had been vaccinated before and it left no mark; that he then said nothing; that he should vaccinate her again; that she held up her arm to be vaccinated; that no one touched her; that she did not tell him she did not want to be vaccinated; and that she took the ticket which he gave her certifying that he had vaccinated her, and used it at quarantine. She was one of a large number of women who were vaccinated on that occasion without, so far as appears, a word of objection from any of them. They all indicated by their conduct that they desired to avail themselves of the provisions made for their benefit. There was nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff to indicate to the surgeon that she did not wish to obtain a card which would save her from detention at quarantine, and to be vaccinated, if necessary for that purpose. Viewing his conduct in the light of the surrounding circumstances, it was lawful; and there was no evidence tending to show that it was not. The ruling of the court on this part of the case was correct.

The plaintiff contends that if it was lawful for the surgeon to vaccinate her the vaccination was negligently performed. "There was no evidence of want of care or precaution by the defendant in the selection of the surgeon, or in the procuring of the virus or vaccine matter." Unless there was evidence that the surgeon was negligent in performing the operation, and unless the defendant is liable for this negligence, the plaintiff must fail on the second count.

Whether there was any evidence of negligence of the surgeon we need not inquire, for we are of opinion that the defendant is not liable for his want of care in performing surgical operations. The only ground on which it is argued that the defendant is liable for his negligence is that he is a servant engaged in the defendant's business and subject to its control. We think this argument is founded on a mistaken construction of the duty imposed on the defendant by law. By the 5th section of the Act of Congress of August 2, 1882 (22 U. S. Stat. at L. 188) it is provided that "every steamship or other vessel carrying or bringing emigrant passengers, or passengers other than cabin passengers, exceeding fifty in number, shall carry a duly competent and qualified surgeon or medical practitioner, who shall be rated as such in the ship's articles, and who shall be provided with surgical instruments, medical comforts and medicines proper and necessary for diseases and accidents incident to sea voyages, and for the proper medical treatment of such passengers during the voyage, and with such articles of food and nourishment as may be proper and necessary for preserving the health of infants and young children, and the service of such surgeon or medical practitioner shall be promptly given in any case of sickness or disease to any of the passengers or to any infant or young child of any such passengers, who may need his services. For a violation of either of the provisions of this section the master of the vessel shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars."

Under this Statute it is the duty of the ship-owners to provide a competent surgeon whom the passengers may employ if they choose in the business of healing their wounds and curing their diseases. The law does not put the business of treating sick passengers into the charge of common carriers and make them responsible for the proper management of it. The work which the physician or surgeon does in such cases is under the control of the passengers themselves. It is their business, not the business of the carrier. They may employ the ship's surgeon, or some other physician or surgeon who happens to be on board, or they may treat themselves if they are sick, or may go without treatment if they prefer, and if they employ the surgeon they may determine how far they will submit themselves to his directions, and what of his medicines they will take and what reject, and whether they will submit to a surgical operation or take the risk of going without it. The master or owners of the ship cannot interfere in the treatment of the medical officer when he attends a passenger. He is not their servant engaged in their business and subject to their control as to his mode of treatment. They do their whole duty if they employ a duly qualified and competent surgeon and medical practitioner and supply him with all necessary and proper instruments, medicines, and medical comforts, and have him in readiness for such passengers as choose to employ him. This is the whole requirement of the Statute of the United States applicable to such cases, and if, by the nature of their undertaking to transport passengers by sea, they are under a liability at the common law to make provision for their passengers in this respect, that liability is no greater. It is quite reasonable that the owners of a steamship used in the transportation of passengers should be required by law to provide a competent person to whom sick passengers can apply for medical treatment, and when they have supplied such a person it would be unreasonable to hold them responsible for all the particulars of his treatment when he is engaged in the business of other persons in regard to which they are powerless to interfere.

The reasons on which it is held in the courts of the United States and of Massachusetts that the owners are liable for the negligence of a pilot in navigating the ship, even though he is appointed by public agencies, and the master has no voice in the selection of him, do not apply to this case. The China, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 53-67, 19 L. ed. 67, 72; Yates v. Brown, 8 Pick. 23. The pilot is engaged in the navigation of the ship, for which, on grounds of public policy, the owners should be held responsible. The business is theirs, and they have certain rights of control in regard to it. They may determine when and how it shall be undertaken, and the master may displace the pilot for certain causes. But in England it has been held that even in such cases the owners are not liable. Carruthers v. Sydebottom, 4 Maule & S. 77; The Protector, 1 W. Rob. 45; The Maria, Id. 95.

The view which we have taken of this branch of the case is fully sustained by a unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeals of New York in Laubheim v. De Koninglyke, N. S. B. Co. 107 N. Y. 228, 9 Cent. Rep. 732. See also Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 221; McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital, 120 Mass. 432.

We are of opinion that on both parts of the case the rulings at the trial were correct.

The evidence excepted to was rightly admitted.

Exceptions overruled.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Field, Ch. J.) for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to restrain defendant from entering upon or using plaintiff's land. Bill dismissed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. J. H. Benton, Jr., for plaintiff:

The taking upon the validity of which defendant's right to cross plaintiff's location wholly depends is a taking of a right of way across the location and tracks of an operated railroad. Such a taking is not within the authority given by the general language of the Act.

Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 63; Boston & M. R. v. Lowell & L. R. Co. 124 Mass. 368; Quincy v. Boston, 148 Mass. 389.

Land appropriated to the public use of a railroad cannot be taken for any other public use without specific legislative authority. The only question, therefore, is whether the land covered by the railroad location between the tracks and the pond had been appropriated to railroad use at the time the location of the Water Company was filed. In other words, the question is, What constitutes an appropriation of land to a public use?

The term "appropriated" has been said to "embrace every mode by which property may be applied to the use of the public."

The real question is, Has the land been impressed with a public trust, so that it is the duty of the corporation to hold and use it for railroad purposes?

The public have a right to an ample supply of pure water, and the company to which the right of taking land has been granted has the capacity to appropriate enough for that purpose, but the appropriation must not be in excess of the actual necessities of the case. Spring Valley Water Works v. San Mateo Water Works, 64 Cal. 123.

In Massachusetts the great ponds are regarded as public property, and the riparian owner cannot claim damages for water drawn off by an aqueduct company, under legislative authority. Fay v. Salem & D. A. Co. 111 Mass. 27.

Land acquired for station purposes is appropriated to public use.

Norwich & W. R. Co. v. Worcester County Comrs. 151 Mass. 69.

An appropriation to public use does not require actual occupation of the land.

If a railroad company acquires five acres of land for terminal freight yards and tracks convenient and suitable for that purpose in anticipation of the growth of business, and covers only a portion with yards and tracks, intending to cover the remainder as the business requires, it cannot be properly said that only the portion actually covered and built upon is appropriated to railroad purposes.

The necessity for land for railroad use is not confined to a present necessity, but is to be decided with reference to the prospective business of the company.

When it has been decided that land is necessary for a public use, the decision cannot be questioned in any collateral proceeding.

Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Williamson, 91 N. Y. 552.

The question of whether a certain piece of land is necessary for a public use, is not a judicial question at all, and cannot be passed upon by the court.

Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 406, 25 L. ed. 208, 207.

Whether the land was reasonably necessary, and what uses of it would promote the purposes for which the corporation was established, was properly determined by its own officers in the exercise of their honest judgment and discretion.

Massachusetts Gen. Hospital v. Somerville, 101 Mass. 319.

The reasoning by which legislative intent is established in a case like this is the same as that by which a right of way by necessity is established, and rests wholly upon the fundamental fact that the grant cannot otherwise take effect. Grants to private persons by im-waters of great ponds for the purpose of supplying its inhabitants with water, and providing for the payment of damages, the owners of mill privileges along the outlet of such ponds are entitled to compensation for the privileges thus destroyed or impaired, and parties who are using the waters for other purposes than for power are entitled to damages. Each mill-owner can bring a proceeding, and a corporation owning a mill at some distance from the stream, the water being conveyed to it by a canal, may also bring a proceeding for the assessment of damages. Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 134 Mass. 267.

Water rights may be taken so far as may be necessary for the preservation and purity of water, including prescriptive rights to discharge sewage into such waters. Gray v. Boston, 139 Mass. 323.

A provision empowering the owners to appraise the compensation and fix the maximum of water to be taken is not unconstitutional; the latter provision enables the commissioners to determine the damages. Re Middletown, 82 N. Y. 196; Mills, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 83.

The right of eminent domain remains in the aggregate body of the people in their sovereign capacity; and possession of private property may be resumed by them whenever the interest or even the convenience of the State is concerned. Whiteman v. Wilmington & S. R. Co. 2 Harr. (Del.) 514, 33 Am. Dec. 419.

The people have the right to resume possession of property in the manner directed by the laws and Constitution of the State, whenever the public interest requires it. *Walker v. Land is no more property than a franchise. Both 13 L. R. A.

are subject to the right of eminent domain. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 2 Abb. U. S. 336. See West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 535; Enfield Toll-Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 17 Conn. 454.
